Nearly four months elapsed from the day the prince reported for duty till Field Marshal French gave him twenty-four hours' leave. This was early in March, and instead of spending his time in the big white house in which he lives the prince ordered his car and, leaving the noncommissioned officer behind, took his brother officer and was on his way to Paris as fast as his car could carry him.

On his arrival he went to an old fashioned hotel in the Rue de Rivoli, facing the Tuileries gardens, and sent word of his presence to the British embassy in the Faubourg St. Honore. When the Right Hon. Sir Francis Bertie, the ambassador, heard about it he at once wired over to Buckingham palace, but the king and queen evidently decided not to interfere. So the ambassador called upon the Prince of Wales and took him round to lunch with President Poincare.

GREAT OCEAN TO OCEAN HIGHWAY

BY GLENWOOD CRAYTON

IN LITTLE PARIS

THE European war has caused attention more strongly than ever before upon the ideas embodied in the phrase, "See America First." Thousands who have been in the nature of spending their vacations abroad are scanning the map of the United States with renewed interest and are discovering that natural attractions which wonders and good roads where they had hardly thought in existence are to be found without the necessity of passing an ocean "First."

With the great impetus which the automobile has which has given to touring in America and with the rapid development of better roads, the motorist has been treated during the highways and byways in some of the scenes that are new and roads that are good. This year, 1915, will see a great stream of travel from the east and west to east—attracted by the two California expositions and by the wonders of a transcontinental tour by motor.

Definite routes have been established and the automobile owner now has almost as great a choice of routes as has the traveler by rail. The truly remarkable work has been done within the last few years in developing highways and linking them together into interstate and national roads. They are named and marked, mapped and pictured until it is the exception for the motorist to get himself on a nameless route.

The latest of the transcontinental highways is the Pikes Peak Ocean to Ocean highway. This road is being developed by an association resulting from the federation of several strong state units.

The Pikes Peak Ocean to Ocean highway has its beginning at Atlantic City, Wildwood, Ocean City, Cape May, Sea Isle City, Ventnor, Longport, Atlantic City, Margate, Longport, Ventnor, Sea Isle City, Cape May, Wildwood, Ocean City, Atlantic City. Starting from Terre Haute Ind., it follows the National road through Indianapolis to Salt Lake City, Utah, with splendid connections at Salt Lake City, Utah, with the Pikes Peak road with the National Trails road, which carries it through Indianapolis, Columbus, Wheeling, Cumberland to the national capital, Washington, and thence to New York city. From Springfield, Ill., it runs due east and southeast through Springfield, Decatur, Effingham, Vincennes, Terre Haute, Indianapolis, Columbus, Wheeling, Cumberland, Washington, Philadelphia, Trenton, Camden, Atlantic City, Wildwood, Ocean City, Cape May, Sea Isle City, Ventnor, Longport, Atlantic City. Starting from Toledo, Cleveland, Erie, Buffalo, Rochester, Albany and down the Hudson to New York city.

From Terre Haute, it continues westward through Springfield, Ill., crossing the Mississippi river at Hannibal, Mo., thence in a direct line over the Hannibal-St. Joseph Cross State highway through Missouri to St. Joseph. Here it joins the Rock Island highway through northern Kansas, through Hoxie, Colby, Norton and Oakley, to connect at the Colorado line with the Pikes Peak route through Colorado Springs. Here it enters the mountains through the pass, and after crossing the Sierra Madre range, begins the ascent of the continental divide which is achieved, just beyond Leadville, on a 4 per cent grade over a fine macadamized road. The highest point on the road, and the highest point on any transcontinental highway, is reached in the ascent by the peaceful Eagle River valley, which leads into the Glenwood canyon, where the road follows the Canyon of the Grand River to Glenwood Springs. At Hite, the highway turns northward from the railroad, through Meeker, Colo., Vernal, Roosevelt and Duchesne, Utah, to Provo and Salt Lake City. At the Mormon capital it has several connections, one through Ogden, both to the north and south of the lake, via the Lincoln highway through Reno to San Francisco, or the road by way of Tonopah to either Los Angeles or San Francisco.

A look at the map will show that the Pikes Peak Ocean to Ocean highway crosses the central part of the United States in a line as straight as the contour of the country will permit, that it traverses a section rich in natural resources, of diversified commercial agricultural and mining activities, of great scenic beauty, of many of the United States of historic associations, and that it cuts through the heart of the Rocky mountains and makes accessible magnificence and grandeur included in no other route.

To demonstrate the feasibility of this highway, there was held last summer an official inspection trip from St. Joseph to Colorado Springs, followed by a reliability run from that point to Salt Lake City. Regarding the portion of the road between St. Joseph and Colorado Springs a member of the official party said: "This tour holds no dreariness, no weariness, no monotony. This is pleasant thoroughfare. The meeting that was in formation for the trail was held in March, 1912, and so busy have the promoters been that you can speed along the whole way at a rate of from twenty-five to thirty-five miles an hour—and we did. Markers everywhere tell you when and how to turn. Hospitality greets you on every hand. There are long, level stretches in Kansas; you'll be disappointed if there weren't. You run through them just long enough to get enjoyment out of the scene, and then you dip down into the most delicious valleys and around wooded trails and through leafy dells. You always think of rolling or teams and clouds of dust and a dreadful thirst when you turn your mind toward western Kansas. But the real truth is that traveling through this country—and eastern Colorado as well—is a delightful surprise. You get just enough of everything you've heard about to bring them, and never too much. You see jack rabbits, and prairie dogs, and sod houses, and tumble weed—and also and in profusion—cornfields extending far over the divide as you can see—and wheat until your eyes get tired of distance. Eastern Colorado is the biggest surprise. You are fascinated throughout by the scenery, by the history of the country and the history told you by men and by silent landmarks and tokens along the way."

The trip from Colorado Springs to Salt Lake City by auto over the Pikes Peak Ocean to Ocean highway is described as "a series of pleasant impressions," said one of the members of the reliability party. "Every mile of the way is interesting; most of it is pleasant, and some of it is both charming and thrilling. No one can truthfully say that he has seen the grandeur and beauty of the Rocky mountains unless he has made this trip. We enter the mountains at Manitou, through historic Ute pass. The canyon broadens and then the road winds over pine-covered hills. The bright colors of the rock gives way to gray, and rugged formations to comparatively smooth hills, a great rock basin, miles across, lies before us; we catch glimpses of snow-capped mountains 80 miles away. We climb through picturesque wooded hills, and as we reach the top of a small pass get our first view of South Park—a great inhabited 20 miles long and 10 wide. Beyond, a winding road leads to Buena Vista, and as we follow up the Arkansas river, we pass over the long, long road. It is not long until we catch glimpses of Twin lakes—great crystal gems that nestle at the feet of towering mountains. A hundred miles west to Leadville, world-famed mining camp, and the high city of its size in the world. We pass only nine miles to the Continental divide—Tennessee pass, two miles above sea level. The road is similar to a boulevard, and the upgrade is only 4 per cent. After leaving the Continental divide the road runs over a abandoned railroad grade, around and through a valley or indescribable charm; we pass into a rugged canyon to the town of Red Cliff and from there to Half way up the mountains one forgets his fear in the fascination of the panorama which lies before him. Now we proceed along the top of the canyon rim past a mining camp; and again we are thrilled as we look into the yawning depths below. We ride along the side of this gorge for miles and miles, the horrors gradually beyond the power of words. Then we descend into the Eagle River valley and pass from almost appalling grandeur into a peaceful, fertile valley. A run of 8 miles brings us to the entrance to Glenwood canyon, through which runs the Grand river. We were settle can describe this trip as the automobile winds over the narrow road around the base of towering painted cliffs and peaks which assume a multitude of fantastic shapes. Each turn in the canyon brings to view some still the decorated walls, the rushing river that hurls itself in stenous rapids over the stones but until at last we come out of the canyon directly into the delightful resort of Glenwood Springs. The ride to Hite is most refreshing; in place of the ruggedness of the awesome canyon, we have a broad fertile valley framed by pretty rising bright red mountains. Here the Pikes Peak Ocean to Ocean highway leaves the railroad and follows Roaring fork, through a country of quiet, pleasing but varied beauty, to Meeker, an inland town in the heart of the valley of White river. After leaving the rich, irrigated land, much of the country is a dry, parched, uninteresting land, between Dangerly and the Utah line is the only section of desert 35 miles, traversed by the highway. As soon as we cross into Utah we reach a graded road, through flat tableland skirted with rolling, rocky hills. Beyond, the road is surrounded by a fertile, well-cultivated valley, and it is most refreshing to see farms, thriving prosperous agricultural country which continues as we go westward through the Uintah basin to Salt Lake City. Regarding the portion of the road west of Salt Lake City, Utah, the party said: "This tour holds no dreariness, no weariness, no monotony. This is pleasant thoroughfare. The meeting that was in formation for the trail was held in March, 1912, and so busy have the promoters been that you can speed along the whole way at a rate of from twenty-five to thirty-five miles an hour—and we did. AFTER THE WINTER'S COLD

Thoreau Was Never Able to Determine Exactly the First Thing That Stirred in the Spring.

Thoreau, as revealed in his journal, was for years trying to settle in his own mind what was the first thing that stirred in spring, after the severe New England winter—the thing that was the first sign of returning life manifest; and he never seems to have been quite sure. He ends not get six feet of his bird. He dug into the swamps, he peered into the water, he felt with benumbed hands for the rapid leaves of the plants lying under the snow; he inspected the buds on the willows, the catkins on the alders; he went out before daylight of a March morning and remained out even after dark; he watched the Sphinx moth and mossed on the rocks; he listened for the birds; he was on the alert for sounds; he watched the frogs; he said they have started a little; and "you look sharply, while passing along some ship?"; he stuck a pin here and he stuck a pin there, and there, and said he could not satisfy himself. Nor can any one. Life appears to start in several things simultaneously. Of a warm, hazy day in February the snow is suddenly covered with myriads of minute specks resembling black new pepper just spilled there. Or you may see a winged insect in the air. Or the painted cliffs and peaks of towering the sunshine lies warm on the lawn ground, you will probably see a frog hopper or two. The grass hatches out under the snow, and why should not the grasshopper?—John Burroughs, "Signs and Seasons."

THE SANDMAN STORY

By Mrs. F. A. WALKER

THE WISHING ROCK.

Benjamin was a cross little boy and did not play nicely with his sister Lillian, and one day when she was sitting on a rock under a tree an apple fell right near Lillian and she picked it up.

"Give me that apple," said Benjamin; "I want it."

Lillian told him she would give him half of it, but that did not satisfy the greedy boy.

"I wish it were hung on your mouth," he said.

Up jumped the apple and hung on her mouth. This frightened both of them, but Benjamin pretended that it did not frighten him, and said:

"I wish you had them all over you."

Down came the apples from the tree and fastened themselves on Lillian's body who began to cry.

"I wish you had them on you," she said.

Off flew the apples and fastened themselves on Benjamin.

"I wish they were all on the trees again," said Benjamin.

And away went the apples into the tree again.

Benjamin began to think that every thing they wished came to pass and he wished that he could be good and again, so he put up on and walked around, wishing to himself that he could see a bear, but none came. He sat on the rock and began thinking how cross he was, and still had the wish in his mind to see a bear.

Just then he looked and coming toward him from the woods was a big black bear. Benjamin was never scared and he ran as fast as he could and the bear after him. Lillian sat on the rock, so frightened to move.

"Oh, I wish he would go back into the wood!" she said, and instantly the bear turned and went into the woods.

When Benjamin came back she told him how she had wished the bear into the woods.

"It is this rock," Benjamin said.

"It must be a wishing rock. Let us wish for a lot of nice things to eat."

And while he was speaking a table rose up from the ground and on it were candy, nuts, cake and ice cream. Benjamin began eating as fast as he could, and as long as he could swallow, and then rolled off the rock and went to sleep upon the ground.

Lillian was not so greedy. She ate a little of all the nice things and then like a good housekeeper, wished to have the table taken away, and it disappeared.

"Now, I wonder what I had better wish for next," said Lillian. "I need a coat for the winter." Right on the tree was a nice, warm coat.

"I had better wish for skates for Benjamin," she said, "for he will not be up to me a long time if I can't be too late for him to wish them."

Right on the tree the skates were skates beside the coat.

"I should like some for myself," said Lillian, "but it is really too much to ask." But before she finished wishing there they were.

"I should have thought of poor Esther, and Lillian, who wants a cow? 'Moo! Moo!' and turning around Lillian saw a nice, fat cow standing near her.

The cow was setting, and she thought that they should go home so she shook Benjamin by the shoulder.

"Get up," she told him, "we can go home."

When Benjamin saw all the things he was very angry.

"You do not wish anything for me," he said. "You are a selfish girl." And he gave her a push which sat her on the rock again.

"I wish I had wished for you to be a better boy," she said.

Up went the cow and went out of sight, and at the same time Benjamin began to think that he was a naughty boy. He gathered up the things Lillian had wished for, and taking the cow by the horns, led her home. When they reached home they told their father and mother about the things they had wished and were going to wish for more the next day. But he told them it would be of no use to wish tomorrow, that the wish was a wishing rock only once in a hundred years, for one day from sunrise to sunset. He told them he had wished for it, but did not know where it was. Lillian did not say anything, but she thought to herself that she was glad she made the last wish before the sun went out of sight.

Not Much.

A New England clergyman of ability has been in other work for several years and his son, of five summers, has rarely seen him in the pulpit. Recently the little fellow heard his father preach away from home, in vacation, and took early occasion to inquire:

"Aunty, is yaps a preacher?"

"Yes, dear."

"Is he a real preacher?"

"Certainly, dear."

"But, say, aunty, he isn't much of a preacher, is he?"

"Why, dear?"

"The sermons will not soon hear the last of this criticism.

What Belongs to Today.

Do what you can, with all you have, That sounds easy, does it not, and yet a great many people, and some of them rather than your girls, are always in hot water because of trying to do just what belongs to yesterday. When you go to bed at night, knowing that all the day's duties are finished and done with, you may be certain that tomorrow will be all that you can ask.—Gift's Companion.

Firmness and Obstinacy.

"What is firmness, father?"

"Firmness, my boy, is obstinacy in a good cause."

"And what is obstinacy?"

"Obstinacy is firmness in somebody else."

URGES COURSE IN SWIMMING

Every Boy and Girl Should Be Taught the Art—Offsets Evil Effects of Corset Wearing.

"Canadians know better how to swim than Americans and Hawaiians more about swimming than the people of any other country, perhaps," said G. H. Corsan, professor of swimming in the University of Toronto, while in Washington recently. "Swimming is the best exercise that can be had. Hitherto it has been one of the secrets of the art of swimming, a fact which explains the smooth round muscles of swimmers and their freedom from old-age wrinkles. A weak or tired boy receives a much cooler rest and thereby is strengthened after an easy swim. Swimming makes women robust and the action of the sun and air on the skin while swimming is unequalled by artificial treatment. It has been demonstrated that swimming offsets the evil effects of corset wearing and of the cramped position of the sedentary worker, and it relieves us from the worry of drowning.

"I believe that every boy and girl should be taught to swim, and that a regular course in swimming should be a part of our public schools. I quote not the statistics at hand as to the number of deaths each year from drowning, but they are enormous and crowing every year. This is because there are fewer young persons who learn to swim than years ago, when almost every boy came to town or could swim before he was seven years old. Now boys on the farm know how to swim, because the creeks and small rivers are at hand, but in the city the boys and girls who swim are comparatively few, for the reason that swimming is not taught as it ways taught in schools or gymnasiums.

NEW COIN AND CARD TRICK

Somewhat Similar to Famous Japanese Trick Where Bricks Are Balanced on the Edge of Sword.

Place a card on your forefinger, as shown in our illustration. On it place a quarter, half-dollar or dollar, on the right hand give the corner of the card a flip so as to shoot it away horizontally, holding it neither up nor down, but fairly in the middle. The card flies off to the other end of the room, and the coin remains motionless on the finger.

Coin Remains on Finger.

Why is this? Why does not the coin follow the card?

Other examples of the law of inertia are: When we strike our clothes with the rattan they fly out from them, and when we knock the bandle off the hammer head we do it best by striking the far end of the stick while holding the middle loosely in the hand.

An even better illustration of this law is that in which out of a pile of coins the middle one can be struck away from the others, while the top one will fall into the glass.

Japanese jugglers balance pieces of bricks are taken and balanced on a stick, and one by one knocked away without disturbing the pile. The pile is thrown upright in the air off the top of the stick, and the last brick, after knocks the bottom brick the stick is instantly dropped to the ground, and the shortened pile drops in perfect balance on the top, to be again thrown up and knocked out of it.

NEW ROLLER SKATING CRAZE

New York Rink Manager Says It Helps to Develop Dancing—Calls Confidence and Grace.

The roller skating craze has broken out anew here, according to a New York city dispatch to the Detroit Journal. With a dozen or more rinks crowded and a twenty-floor-long room on rollers attracting an enthusiastic crowd the old indoor sport bids fair to vie with the dances of the decrepit who have become dancing mad. On the Bronx side a rink has been discovered that by taking a few whirls around the room on rollers you will learn the modern steps. "This is according to the manager of the largest rink.

"It's a strange thing" he said, "but a great many of my patrons have told me recently that they never were thoroughly understood nor appreciated the modern dances until they had taken up roller skating. Confidence on the rolled skates seems to give them an added confidence and grace when dancing, with the result that many who before were but fair dancers are now really quite expert.

Which probably accounts for the fact that there is almost as much interest shown in the roller skating contests as there is in the dance contest and fox trot competitions.

A Dangerous Doctrine.

The well-meaning woman who was visiting a school addressed the pupils after the dismissal hour on the subject of "The Effects of Juvenile Chastisement in the American Home." The school was very quiet, knowing that one little boy was crying.

"What's the matter, little boy?" she asked.

"Please, ma'am," said the little boy, "I don't think I can get off up for being good."

Politeness Wasted.

"John, did you take the note to Mr. Jones?"

"Yes, but I don't think he can read it."

"Why so, John?"

"Because he can't see, sir. While I was in the room he asked me twice where my hat was, and it was on his head all the time."—Chicago Sunday News.

Siren and Schemer

By Augustus Goodrich Sherwin

(Copyright, 1915, by W. G. Chapman.)

Plain, honest John Edgerly drove the plow steadily and cheerily. It was not much of a farm that his parents had left him, but it brought him in a living.

More than once he had been tempted to sell out and invest in some small business in the bustle, promising city. He had become cured of that, however, during the last month. Several venturesome young fellows like himself had tried metropolitan ambition and had returned home sneaky, disconsolate and sick of an experience that had turned out hollow and unfriendly.

Then, too, just that bright, lovely morning John had made up his mind to something. He had been keeping company with Vera Brooks for some time back. Vera was modest and humble as himself, but he believed she liked him.

"I'll settle down," ruminated John contentedly—"yes, that's the best way."

It looked so to him. Vera would make an ideal wife. Her folks were poor, she would appreciate a good home. Small as the little homestead was, it was comfortable and fairly furnished. Love would thaw the two. They would work together and save, and some day they might own a better place in the world, with Grinnell Grange and his haughty empress of a daughter, by.

"I'll ask Vera this very evening," resolved John, and was happy in the thought.

"Whoa!"

John, just finishing a furrow, looked up to discover a buggy halted just beyond the fence. It is not the very object of his recent thoughts—the judge and his daughter. The former leaped from the vehicle as if John was his greatest friend in the world. Miss Grinnell smiled at him—a thing she had never done before.

"Hello!" muttered John, "what's up?"

The judge hurried through the fence rails. He looked excited, the bearer "That's fair," said John, in his blunt, practical way.

It was settled that John was to get ready at once. The judge never let him out of his sight. John arranged to have a neighbor attend to the little farm during his absence. He longed to see Vera and tell her the good news. The judge, however, stuck to him like a brother. They hours later, quite a reconstructed John, the young farmer was aboard a train, seated beside the judge's daughter, bound for the city.

John was quite flattered by the attention of Miss Grinnell. In fact, she somewhat attracted him. They all went to the same hotel. For two days the judge left the young folks a good deal of themselves. He claimed to be closing up the estate in the probate court.

John said some foolish things to his fair companion. In fact, she flirted quite outrageously with him. The judge rolled him or the circumstances. "Why, John, you are a bad boy," he whispered in John's ear one day. "She's worth it," and he chuckled at the young John jocularly in the ribs.

Vera was sent for. On the theater. It was a new and rare experience for John. Then, as the days dragged by and his infatuation for Miss Grinnell by professed to be settling up the case, John began to get impatient.

One evening he overheard the judge and his daughter conversing. He learned that the former was bent on entrapping him as a rich son-in-law. John thought of Vera at home. He was ashamed of having ever thought of any love but hers. He made a sudden resolve. The next morning he told the judge he was a still, personal hunt for the executor of his uncle's estate.

He was gone five several hours. The judge scanned him closely when he returned.

"Something to say to you, John," he observed in a confidential way. "My poor girl."

"Why, what about her?" inquired John wonderingly.

"I see she is mourning for four you know, John. Why don't you propose to her and get the engagement ring at once?"

"You think she would have me?" asked John, with a peculiar expression in his eyes.

"I do," assured the lawyer.

"Perhaps not, when I tell you what I have done," said John coolly. "I've been to see the executor of my uncle's estate. Why, his son left a will—with three little children unprovided for."

"What's that to us?" demanded the judge.

"Everything to me. I, seems that my cousin Harold was entranced from his father through a mistake. I have learned that on his death bed my uncle wished to change his will, for he had learned of the wrong he had done his son."

"Well, he didn't change it," remarked the judge.

"No, but I have. You think I'd rob those dear little children of their rights! No, sir! I've sent Harold the entire estate, and all my claim to the estate. I say, judge, how about marrying your daughter now?"

"Bah!" shouted the infuriated judge, and with the words ringing in John's ears Miss Grinnell passed by John with a contemptuous sneer an hour later.

John felt no regret. He had learned back to Vera and told her everything. He had laid him a noble sacrifice for his great unselfish sacrifice, and gained his reward. Vera was not so certain very imperative question.

And their reward came. The day they were married, the executor of his uncle's estate appeared at the little farm with a check for John, which insisted on dividing the twenty thousand dollars with the happy newly-wedded couple.

Scares Himself Well.

Roscoe Wilson, a merchant of Neenah, N. J., has a peculiar way of scaring days ago. The biscouch followed the trail of a rabbit.

Unable to sleep, Wilson began wandering away. Three physicians were called to treat him. He prescribed medicine, told him funny stories to make him laugh, and finally had a make him bring true. Nothing helped.

Wilson, utterly worn out, managed to get to sleep, and as he slept, he dreamed that he was a wicked boy with bloodguilt. The bed shook so violently that Wilson was frightened and leaped out. He no longer hiccoughed. Apparently fright had acted as a cure.

Carpets on Pavements.

Aniline dyes have not added to the reputation of the carpets of Persia. At one time the only dyes used in the Persian carpet industry came from indigo, madder, and vine leaves. From these were evolved many delicate shades impervious to the action of sunlight. With aniline dyes the colors fade more rapidly. In Persia they may be seen hung upon the floors of bazaars, so that many feet may tread on them. By such hard wear—provided the colors are fast—the genuine article increases in appearance, acquiring an attractive gloss. A Persian carpet of the best kind has a marvelous number of stitches, and a beautiful of pure silk may cost hundreds of dollars.

The First Tumblers.

The glasses we now know as tumblers differ widely from the drinking vessel to which the name was first applied. There appear to have been of metal or wood, and from their peculiar shape seem to have served as perhaps the earliest form of bottle. One authority says they were called tumblers because they could not be set down except on the side when empty, and another derives their name from their original shape, rounded at the bottom so that they tumbled over unless they were carefully put down.

Acrobatic Feat.

Fashion certainly does go from one extreme to the other with the most accomplished society and we can see from an authoritative source that the girls are even now engaged in hoping from their present meager surroundings into tight knee breeches and spiral

TO PREPARE AND USE VEGETABLES

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT EXPERTS GIVE RESULTS OF STUDY AND EXPERIMENT.

ON CHOOSING AND CLEANING

Care Must Precede the Process of Cooking—Try Combinations—Some Suggestions on the Proper Way of Serving.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Careful cleaning, sorting and classifications of vegetables must precede any process of cookery. Medium-sized vegetables are always to be preferred to the overlarge. Food plants retarded in normal growth are liable to be tough and corky, while those having abundant moisture and sunlight and making normal growth are crisp, tender and well flavored.

The shortest time from the time and journey between garden and table the better the result. Vegetables will wilt or gather vegetables while wilted or otherwise impaired the effects of the midday sun, but rather to pick them after the dew has evaporated in the morning or in the cool of the late afternoon. Wilted vegetables can never be wholly satisfactory, but may be improved by careful washing and removal of inferior portions and then soaking in cold water, or with salad plants by wrapping in a damp cloth and keeping in a cool place.

The soaking of vegetables in cold water to freshen them probably extracts a little of the valuable salts which they contain. When they are boiled in hot water or parboiled still more mineral matter is lost. If the cooking water is afterwards used no use is made, some of the soluble salts matter is extracted and wasted. This waste may be avoided by using the water for soup, etc.

Often it is convenient and wise to cook a double portion of a vegetable and serve part of it a second day in a different form. This should not be attempted if the vegetable is stored in refrigerator is available, as the vegetables may spoil. Ordinarily a vegetable well salted while cooking and drained and cooled quickly and kept covered in a cold place will keep 24 or 48 hours in cool weather.

Blanch potatoes may be cooked to serve as plain boiled or mashed today, while the firmer ones can be reserved to broil or grill in slices, fry, or cream the next day. When gas is the fuel this is worth while, for it takes 10 minutes to boil a pot of fresh potatoes and only ten minutes to reheat them.

Most vegetables are lacking in fat, so we add fat in the form of meat, butter, oil or cream when preparing them for the table, or we serve them with fat meats, etc. As fat as the need of the human body goes, it makes little difference whether this fat is in cheap or in expensive form, whether the vegetable is cooked with fat or dressed with butter, cream or salad oil. Olive oil and thick cream, at most about the same, but the oil keeps better, and hence always may be kept on hand, while cream can be obtained by combining cream with vegetable fats, or using butter and milk costing quite as much.

Whenever a vegetable dish, other than dried beans, peas, or other leguminous vegetables, is to be the principal part of a meal, it is usually possible, as well as reasonable to increase the nutritive value by the addition of milk, cheese, or eggs. Skim milk may be heated uncovered until considerable water has evaporated, little or no thickening is needed for a soup or cream sauce made with it.

Do Not Hesitate to Experiment With Combinations.

Though only a few are common on most tables, there are many combinations of vegetables which have been satisfactory, and no one need hesitate to experiment with others. In general it is better to combine a starchy vegetable with a succulent one, or one lacking in flavor with an other of more flavor.

For example, cooked celery is delicious when mixed with mashed potato.

Green corn with potatoes and onion, with the addition of milk, etc., makes a chowder which many consider as good as fish.

Potatoes boiled and cut to slices or cubes may be used to extend more expensive or more highly flavored vegetables in salads. For instance, out-of-season string beans or cottonseed new celery.

Potatoes with onions or white turnips make a more agreeable soup for some palates than the same vegetables alone.

Carrots often are more palatable cut in dice and blended with green peas than served alone.

Large white beans may be served in a tomato sauce with onion and green or red sweet peppers.

Mint, parsely, sweet peppers, onions, etc., may be added in small portions to many vegetables, to give a delicate flavor when the usual methods of serving have become monotonous.

While overdone vegetables are not desirable, underdone ones are often even less appetizing; therefore it is wise to start cooking green vegetables in season and stop the process as soon as the plant is tender, drain and then reheat quickly with seasoning just before serving. Most time taken in cook house do not save time consideration the variations in time required for the same kind of vegetables at different ages. As a general rule the more mature or "older" the vegetable the longer the necessary cooking period.

A small scrubbing brush is essential for washing all vegetables that have grown in the earth, and should be kept in a convenient place, and for this purpose only. A small, sharp knife point is needed for the removal of eyes from potatoes and small blemishes from any vegetables. A wire basket is convenient to hold greens, string beans, or even potatoes, while cooking, as thus they are less likely to adhere to the bottom of the kettle, and often it is easier to remove the heated ones to drain of the water. A potato masher of strong, continuous wire, the two ends inserted in a wooden handle, is inexpensive and fully as satisfactory as a more costly style.

Cooking Terms From France.

A few of the terms indicating the use of vegetables may be of service in studying books arranged by chefs:

A la—According to, or in the style of.

Au Gratin—With browned crumbs, or bread; sometimes with cheese.

Bouquet of Herbs—A sorty each of several kinds, as marjoram, parsley, celery, leaf, savory, thyme.

Creole or West Indian—With tomatoes, often also with peppers, onions and mushrooms.

Jardiniere—Mixed vegetables.

Macedoine—A medley or mixture of vegetables, often with meat.

Maigre—Without meat, as vegetable soup.

Printaniere—A garnish of spring vegetables.

Puree—Material mashed through a strainer.

Roux—Flour browned in butter.

Souffle—A puff, something inflated or light, as by beaten white of egg.

Suggestions for Serving.

Spinach—Use it the best ways to use leftover vegetables is to use it. Careful of cooked cauliflower with some white sauce, and as equal amount of milk and a slight thickening of butter and flour will provide a cream of cauliflower soup. If the vegetable already has white sauce with it, reduce it with milk to the right consistency, season and serve. It will be ready to serve.

A good tasting soup can be made with an onion, one trimmed of a bunch of celery and the outside leaves of the celery, cut up and fry in butter and cooked in a little water and butter or other suitable fat. When tender add water or whole milk, thicken with a little flour or some one of the granular breakfast cereals which cook quickly, season and serve. If preferred, the celery and onions may be cooked separately, added to the vegetables, and all boiled up together.

A puree is half way between a cream soup and thashed vegetables; it is sometimes a thick soup, but offtenest strained vegetables made soft with milk or stock and butter, and served with meats, for instance, a puree of split peas, dried lima beans or cowpeas.

Literary Flavor.

A kind reader who is evidently also a diner-out contributes the following which he guarantees genuine, says the New York Evening Post. It came, he says, from the proprietor of a new Italian restaurant. The phrase "house top side this paper" with its Oriental sanitation, refers to the printed address of the restaurant on the letterhead.

Skunks Kill Army Worms.

The skunk is the best known mammal enemy of army worms. The common army worm, the wheat head army worm and the fall army worm are all very destructive to small grains, corn and pasture, and instances exist where heavy losses among farmers. The good work of skunks in destroying army worms should be encouraged. The use of skunks in the work of extermination. Also he had examined some skunks stomachs which contained chiefly beetles and army worms. Professor Forbes of Illinois also mentioned the skunk as one of the principal enemies of the army worm in that state.—Circular U. S. Dept. Agriculture.

Rabelais and Censorship.

It is not to Rickenower nor the British war department that credit should be given for the rigid press censorship, but to a physician, Rabelais. In his "Pantagruelian Prognostications" he says: "Since, then, they are so ready to ask after news, and consequently the news shall scatter down every Christian story that is told them, were it not expedient that some people, on whose faith we might depend, should hold offices of intelligence on the frontiers of the kingdom, and have a competent salary allowed them, for nothing else but examine the news that is brought, whether it is true or not?"

Aeroplane Propellers.

The propellers of aeroplanes, such as are in the present European war, may be made of selected ash, which has been seasoned and kept well not split under vibration or shock or of built-up layers of spruce with mahogany pasted, in. The work of the machines, too, is generally made of wood, spruce being most used on account of its straight grain and freedom from hidden defects.

SPRINGS NEW ONE IN HOTEL ROBBERY

Sends to Office for $100 Change and Leaves Bearer Locked In.

IN ROOM 50 MINUTES

New York Hotel Is Loser on New Scheme—Guest Beats, Ties and Robs Bellboy, Who Brings Him Change.

New York.—A 50-minute guest at the Hotel McAlpin robbed the management of $100 after knocking unconscious and binding a bellboy who had been sent to the room with the bills he changed. Then he tumbled the stunned boy on to the bed, locked him in and escaped.

At 3:34 o'clock a wealthy, well dressed man, apparently in his thirties, registered as "N. C." or "N. G. Grey, Washington (the management preferred to believe it was "N. G.") and a $4-day room on the fourth floor, Thirty-second street side of the hotel, was assigned to him.

Asks Change for $100.

Just 10 minutes later Grey telephoned down to the cashier to please send him up change for $100, preferably in small bills.

Ninetoenyearold Joseph Abbundi of 44 East Twenty-ninth street, a trusted boy who has been with the hotel since it was opened, was sent to the room with the money in a sealed envelope.

Grey received him with a smile, took the envelope and then seemingly dropped a quarter as if by accident.

"That's for you," he said. "Pick it up."

As the boy was leaning over, the man whipped a revolver out of his pocket and struck him slow back of the head, inflicting a slight cut. Abbundi toppled over, but did not lose consciousness. Grey flourished his gun and threatened to shoot if there was an outcry and then tumbled Abbundi on to the bed and bound him with blankets, pillow slips and strips of sheets. Then he walked out, turned the lock and left the key in the door.

Boy Gives the Alarm.

Abbundi wriggled around on the bed and managed to roll over to a telephone, which he upset and got the receiver in his mouth. He called the office and H. H. Bascombe, a house officer, went up with a bellboy. At the hospital Dr. Rose McIntyre, son, the hotel physician, said his injuries were not serious.

Detective Sergeant Dougherty of the second branch detective bureau was unable to find anybody who saw Grey leave the hotel.

The robber had a cheap new suitcase in which were found four or five shirts with the laundry marks cut out. Of ALLIES OR ENEMIES.

There Were No Neutral Nations In Europe In Ancient Times.

In ancient times nations as war thus of their neighbors as either allies or enemies, writes Herbert W. Horwill. Neutrality as an international relation was not recognized. There were no neutral rights and no neutral duties. International law itself existed only in a very rudimentary form.

It was not until after the fall of Rome and until the nations of Europe had become numerous and were asserting and exercising comparatively equal reputation and power that their interests became so conflicting that they perceived the necessity of establishing and supporting a system of law that must be applicable to them in their relations one with another. Grotius (1583-1645), the so called father of international law, published in 1625 his famous book, "De Jure Belli et Pacis," which defined and described the laws of war and peace. Of neutrals, whom he called middlemen in war, he had but little to say.

Rinkerschok, who was born twenty years after the peace of Westphalia was signed and who was one of the most distinguished successors of Grotius, was, if not the first, at least among the first of publicists to define and establish scientific authoritatively and to give to it a permanent and permanent place in the law of nations.—Cosmopolitan.

PLIGHT OF A POET.

His Vivid Imagination Once Nearly Got Coleridge In Trouble.

From his early youth Coleridge lived in a world of books and dreams, yet his favorite walk seems to have been the Strand, the best place in the world for a poet to live, thought he, by reason of its motley population. As he strolled down the street he imagined himself swimming the Hellespont, the feat of which other poets had written and which the poet Byron was to accomplish later. Once while the mind of Coleridge was thus far from the busy crowd he absently turned his hands before him in the manner of one swimmer. Suddenly he found same in contact with a gentleman's pocket.

The gentleman, thinking to capture a thief, seized the hand and exclaimed:

"What! So young and so wicked!"

He opened the poor poetic boy of an attempt at pocket picking.

With some slight and a few tears the boy expiated, and we can imagine the last words did not fall him who was to become the most brilliant talker of his age. The anecdote was delighted with Coleridge's imagination, when coupled with the mental title the Hellespont. The intelligence of the young lounder made the strongest impression on a metaphysic curious and when a metaphysic curious and when he found the boy Reid books he opened for him a wonderful world at the circulating library in Cheapside.—Westminster Gazette.

ORDER OF THE BATH.

It Was a Realistic Ceremony In the Time of Charles II.

The last knights of the Bath made according to the ancient forms were at the coronation of Charles II., a very various rites and ceremonies, one of which was nothing, perhaps, unfeathered.

According to Pennant, the court barber prepared a bath, and the knights were placed therein in the order, having been undressed by his esquires, was afterwards placed in the bed, his clothes and collars being the sequitaire perquisites of the barber. He was then raised from the water to the words "May this be an honorable bath to you" and was then placed in a plain bed quite wet and naked to dry.

As soon as he was quite dry he was removed from the bed, dressed in new red vestments and conducted by his sponsors to the chapel, where he offered a taper to the honor of God and a penny apiece to the honor of the king. Then he went to the monarch and, kneeling before him, received from the royal sword a tap on the shoulder, the king saying, "Be thou a good knight," and then embraced him, saying, "Be thou a good knight and true."—London Strand Magazine.

A Big Bridge.

A very peculiar institution in the New York city is what is known as "the flying bridge." This magnificent artery is the largest of its kind in the world being 50 feet long, 100 feet wide and 150 feet long. Large coals and other trees are in this case, and the birds live within its wire network. The frame of the cage is built of iron pipes, which are covered over with thin meshed netting.

By Proxy Perhaps.

A well known metropolitan choral conductor was once holding voice trials preliminary to the organization of a colored choir of fifteen singers. One of the soprano applicants was extremely reticent when asked to sing a solo. Finally the director, becoming impatient, asked, "What's the matter?—don't you sing?" "Well," she hesitatingly replied, "not pubsonally."—Argonaut.

Driven From Home.

"I don't see why Charley spends his evenings at the club," said young Mrs. Jones.

"It's your fault," replied her mother. "You will insist on having him at home when he wants smoking jackets and neckties and then inviting the neighbors in to admire them. I know how I feel when company comes to see my fussy neckties."—Washington Star.

SYNOPSIS.

Warrington, an American adventurer, and Jonathan Harvey, a rich country gentlemen, the two known up and down the Irrawaddy as Parrot & Co., travel along the road to Mandalay for Burma rubies. Elsa Greenwell, rich American girl traveler, arrives. Warrington comes aboard the boat at the Bhamo landing and Harvey tells Elsa he has lost Warrington's stake in a game of poker. Warrington comes aboard the boat at the Bhamo landing and Harvey tells Elsa he has lost Warrington's stake in a game of poker. He tells her that Warrington has begun a wager with Elsa and told his all claims for Burma. Warrington tells Elsa he has lost his stake in a game of poker. Elsa is furious and warns Warrington against acquaintance with unknown adventurers. Warrington is lost. They pass two sodden days together on the river.

Warrington pushed ashore to find the dirty goods shop. His social redemption was on the way, if vanity went for anything. It was stirring and tingling with life again. With the money advanced by the purser he bought white and clean clothes, and, as he possessed no watch, returned hurriedly in time to dress for dinner. He was not at all disturbed to learn that the inquisitive Gordon, the colonel and his dippy charge, had decided to proceed to Rangoon by rail. Indeed, there was a bit of satisfaction in the manner as he observed the vacant chairs. Plenty of time for two whole days. And he proposed to make the most of it. Now his mind was on other things as well as a young lady. He simply wanted to play; wanted to give free to the lighter emotions for a long gallop in his lonely heart.

The reason for all these sudden changes and distortions in his passenger lists, gave the situation no thought. He felt only a mild danger all the more alluring because it hung nebulously. What harm could there be in having a little fling? He was an amazingly sane person, an optimistic soul, yet he was not wholly unaware that the situation had for her a subtle fascination at least which she was to novice in effled to fight. She was not wholly ignorant of her power. She could lead the man if she tried. Should she try? They were like two children, setting out to play a game with fire.

She thought of Arthur. Had he gone the length of his thirty-five years without his peculiarities? Scarcely. She understood the general run of men well enough to accept this fact. Whomever she married she was never going to worry him with questions regarding his bachelor life. Nor did she propose to be questioned about her own past. Besides, she hadn't married Arthur yet, she had only promised to do so. And such promises were sometimes sensibly broken. Those thoughts flashed through her mind, disconnectedly, while she talked and laughed.

It never occurred to her to have Martha moved up from the foot of the table. Once or twice she stole a glance at the women who had in the olden days dandled her on her knees. The glance was a mixture of guilt and mischief, like a child's. But the glance had not the power to attract Martha's eyes. Martha felt the glances as surely as if she had lifted her eyes to meet them. She held her peace. She had not been brought along as Elsa's guardian. Elsa was not self-willed but strong willed, and Martha realized that any interference would result in estrangement. In fact, Martha beheld in Warrington a real enemy. The extraordinary resemblance would naturally appeal to Elsa, with what results she could only imagine. Later she asked Elsa if she had told Warrington of the remarkable resemblance.

"Mercy no! And what is more, I do not want him to know. Men are vain as a rule; and I should not like to hurt his vanity by telling him that I could find anybody handsome. Of course he might really have been Arthur Ellison's twin brother.

"The man you are engaged to marry?" asked Mrs. Gordon.

"I beg your pardon, Elsa; but the stranger terrifies me. He is something uncanny."

"Nonsense! You've been reading tales also!" said Elsa.

"It is a terrible country."

"It is the best country," the Elsa! Here a man may wear a dress suit and a bowler without offending anyone."

"And a woman may talk to anyone she pleases."

"You have been with me twenty years," began Elsa mildly.

"And love you better than the whole world! And I wish I could good you always from harm and evil. Those horrid old Englishwomen

"Oh, so there's been gossip already! Why those ugly little meddling gossips. So long as I know that I am doing no wrong, ladies may gossip their heads off. I'm not a kitten."

"You are twenty-five and yet you're only a child."

"What does that signify? That I am too young to manage my own affairs? That I have not my claim to others once? Good soul!" patting her arm around the older woman. "Don't worry about Elsa Greenwood. Her life is her own, but she will never mismanage it."

"Oh, if you were only married and settled down!"

"You mean if I were happily married and settled down. There you have it. I'm in search of happiness. That's the Valley of Diamonds. When I find that, Martha, you may look your fastest to pieces."

"And I have just begun to love Elsa!"

CHAPTER V.

Back to Life.

The two days between Prome and Rangoon were distinctly memorable for the unusual engagements to the man and woman. Those graver of mind and manner when had once been "Can do," replied Warrington, slipping the treasures into a pocket. What a struggle it had been to hold them! Somehow or other he had always been able to meet the interest, though, often to accomplish this feat he had been forced to go without tobacco for weeks.

There is a vein of superstition in all of us, deep it how we will. Warrington was as certain of the fact as he was of the rising and the setting of the sun, that if he lost these he become he never could go back to the old, familiar world, the world in which he had moved and lived and known happiness. Never again would he part with them. A hundred thousand dollars, almost; with his simple wants, he was now a rich man.

"Buy lisa?" asked the Chinaman. He rolled a mandarin's ring carelessly across the showcase. "Gold; all heavy; velly old, velly good ling."

"What does it say?" asked Warrington, pointing to the characters.

"Good luck and plosperity; velly good signs.

It was an unusually beautiful ring, unusual in that it had no setting of jade. Warrington offered three sovereigns for it. The Chinaman smiled and put the ring away. Warrington laughed and laid down five pieces of gold. The Chinaman swept them up in his lean, dry hands. And Warrington, departed, wondering if she would accept such a token.

By four o'clock he arrived at the Chinese tailors in the Holy Pagoda road. He ordered a suit of pongee, to be done at noon the following day. He made the same orders for four other suits, to be finished within a week. Then he went to the showmaker's to the hatter, to the haberdasher. All this business because he wanted her to know that he had been and yet could be. Thus vanity sometimes works out a noble salvation. And it marked the end of Warrington's recidivism.

When he reached his lodging house he sought the Burmese landlady. She greeted him with a smile and a slit little nage of the hand. He owed her money, but that was nothing. Had he not saved her drunken European tatterman husband about his business? Has he not fried her from a tyranny of fits and curses? It has not affected her in the least to learn that her tatterman had been quietly married all the way from Yokohama to Colombo. She was free of him.

Warrington spread out a five-pound note and laid ten sovereigns upon it.

"Here we are," he said genially; "all paid up to date."

"You go 'way?" the smile leaving her pretty moon-face. "You dislike? with a gesture which indicated the parlor and its contents. "Be hose? Half an hour?"

He shook his head soberly. She picked up the money and jingled it in her hand.

"Go-by?" softly.

"Oh, I'm not going quite next Tuesday."

The smile returned to her face, and her body bent in a kind of kotow. He was so big, and his beard glistened like the gold leaf on the Shwe Dagon pagoda. She understood. The white to the white and the brown to the brown; it was the law.

Warrington went up to his room. He was welcomed by a screech from the parrot and a dignified salaam from the man's bagan to find expression. Physically, his yoke became not half mellow; his hands became full of emphasis; his body grew less and less clumsy, more and more leonine. The blunt speech, the irritability in argument, the stupid patience, the careless study of counting phrases, the naughtiest and irrelevant that figuratively accrust the hearts of shy and lonely men, these vanished under her warm if careless glance.

If the crust of barbarism is thick that of civilization is thin enough. As Warrington went forward Elsa stopped and gradually went back, not far, but far enough to cause her to throw down the bars of reserve, to cause to guard her impulses against the invasion of interest and fascination. She faced the fruit squarely. The man fascinated her. He was like a portrait with following eyes. She spoke familiarity of her affairs (always omitting Arthur); she talked of her travels, of the famous people she had met, of the wonderful pageants she had witnessed. It was not her fault that, with the exception of Martha, who didn't count, they two were the only passengers. Her conception of shame was otherwise chargeable to fate; and before the boat reached Rangoon, Elsa was quite willing to let fate shift and set the scenes how it would.

The phase that escaped her entirely was this, that had he not progressed she would have recalled her old golden, the old poise of which she was never conscious, because it is the natural, Elsa had a horror of loneliness, and this was occasioned by the lonely greenmount of the word. What struggles, and how simple! he innocent them! What things he had seen, what adventures had befallen him, what mystery and mystery! She wondered if there had been a woman in his life and if she had been the cause of his downfall. Every day of the past ten years he had spoken her to admire or condemn, but beyond these ten years there was a Chinese wall, over which she might not look. Only once had she provoked the silent negative and of the head. He was strong. Not the smallest corner of the veil was she permitted to turn aside. She walked hither and thither along the scarps and bastions of the barrier, but never found the breach.

"Will you come and dine with me tonight?" she asked, as they left the boat.

"No. Miss Innocence."

"That's silly. There isn't a soul I know here."

"But," gravely he replied, "there are many here who know me."

"Which infers that my invitation is unwise?"

"Absolutely unwise. Frankly, I could not be seen with you."

"Why? Unless, indeed, you have not told me the truth. Whom do I harm?"

"For myself, none. On the best it do not matter much. It was a silly action which neither of us could forseen when we made it. Let it be. Other than the man's bagan to find expression. "Here, that'll do," he cried, seizing the heavier man by the collar. "It isn't worth while to kill a man for a handful of rupees. Let go, you fool!" He used his strength. The man and his victim swung in a half-circle and fell apart.

With a snarl and an oath the yamber sprang to his feet and started toward Warrington. He stopped short.

"Good God!" he murmured; and retreated until he touched the footboard of the bed.

HOW TABBY FOOLED TERRIER

Feline Escapes Attack of Dog by Swimming Swirling Waters of Canal.

I was a witness to what was nearly a tragedy the other day, a writer in the Lowell Citizen-Courier states. An item terrier and a tabby cat were aware at war, and the terrier's barks and assaults were answered by tabby's snarls, and, as she had a chance, by a clever strike with her paws. Tabby's home was against the house and she turned tail and fled, with the terrier close after her. Tabby's home is against the house and she turned tail and fled, with the terrier close after her. EQUATORIAL ECUADOR.

A Land of Earthquakes Nearly All a Mile Above Sea Level.

The traveler arrives in Guayaquil fifteen years quite gray, but he learns that in a journey of a day he can reach the temperate zone. He brings summer clothing for a country crossed by the equator and nearly perilous on the frozen slopes of high mountains. He finds a government as unstable as the volcanoes of Quito. He notes important industries that thrive upon these turbulent shores. Ecuador is a land of contrasts.

It is the land where the Incas ruled after they came into Peru. It was the birthplace of Atahualpa, who fell before Pizarro. It was from his capital, at Quiloto along the mountains that Gonzalo Pizarro took out with Orellana to discover the Amazon.

The land which bears the name of the equator rivals her sister republics in variety of scenery and climate. Her fact rev ns the dazzling green where of a tender river her head wears the fleecy crown of eternal snows. With one hand she pulsts to the wide Pacific with the other, to the matted jungle of the Amazonian valley. Colombia, Brazil and Peru are her neighbors, but who can say where the territory of the one actually begins and the other ends? Two-thirds of the people of Ecuador are Indians, pure and simple. Nine-tenths of the population live a mile above the sea. Her territory is three times as large as Pennsylvania. Her domain is practically unexplored, but commercially she is forging ahead.—National Magazine.

EDUCATING THE INDIAN.

Difficulties the Student Faces After He Has Left College.

The condition to which most Indian students return are hard, far harder than the average university can realize. Many of the reservations are long distances from railroads, so that supplies are hard to get as well as expensive, while in places water is a real luxury. The students of the community must also be taken into consideration, and in all too many hostilities the white people living near are not of a type to prove either helpful or encouraging. With all these difficulties, and many, many more, we expect far more of the Indian than we would of a white student who had enjoyed equal advantages.

A white boy who has been in school until he is perhaps twenty and in that time has had a master in addition to the usual studies a new language and except an entirely strange system of living is not expected to raise the standards of his home community to any very great extent. The Indian is expected to do just that, equipped as he is with a new language and except an entirely strange system of living. Not only have acquired a trade and be able to do skillful work, but he must speak English well enough to act as interpreter, understand the Bible and teach on Sundays and be as well as he prepared to advise in the councils of his people regarding various phases of their land standing and land questions.

And when he is unable to fulfill all these requirements we hear that Indian education is a failure.—Southern Workman.

Masked Women.

Upper class Swahili women wear curious masks, which are made of leather and beads in a wooden frame. The mask is derived from the traditional image of Moslem women, who must keep their faces covered to the presence of men. For several centuries Arab traders have frequented this east Africa coast, and to their influence are due most of the civilized customs found today among the natives of the district. The clothing worn by these prosperous dames is of silk; their shoes are gorgeous of silver and their hands much silver jewelry. The Moslems in Zanzibar, by the way, are less fanatically strict about religious usages than their brethren in Morocco and Turkey.—Wide World Magazine.

Getting Even.

The belle of the little town was getting married, and among the spectators was the reporter of the local newspaper. He was a miserable mess. He had wanted to marry the bride, but the other man got the inside track and got even. This is what he wrote:

"The bride was radiant in a beautiful lavender silk frock, orange blossoms and veil and long, long white gloves, also 9 and split at the thumbs.

"The groom was as straight as a soldiers in his best attire could make him and as red in the face as was to be expected from boots two sizes too small and a fifteen inch collar round a seventeen inch neck. Fortunately before the ceremony was over his collar stud broke and saved him from choking to death."—London Answers.

The Key of Death.

The "key of death" is apparently a large key which is shown among the weapons at the arsenal at Venice. It was invented by Tibaldo, who, disappointed in love, designed this instrument for the destruction of his rival. The key is so constructed that the handle may be turned around, revealing a small spring, which being pressed a very fine needle is driven with considerable force from the other end. This needle is so very fine that the foot closes over the wound immediately, leaving no mark, but the death of the victim from poison is almost instantaneous.

Wouldn't Scare Him.

"Why didn't you toot your horn when you saw the man in the road ahead?"

"I dared," replied the chauffeur, "that it would be more merciful if he never knew what struck him."—Judge.

SECOND ANNUAL OLDER BOYS' CONFERENCE—EAST JORDAN, APRIL 23 AND 24.

Boys Conferences get to be successful but seldom do the first three or four assume the successful proportions that the second annual conference of Charlevoix county did. This event held at East Jordan on the 23rd and 24th was a surprise to even those most interested and emphasized the fact that the County Y. M. C. A. Committee is warranted in giving time to this feature of the work. Ninety-four delegates, representing thirteen organizations were registered for the conference. Two walked nine miles to attend. One hundred and sixty-one men and boys attended the conference banquet. Twenty delegates made their decision to accept Christ.

Hayes township schools experienced their second annual Y. M. C. A. Play Festival on Tuesday of this week. Bay Shore was the scene of the day's activities and the village was alive. The Murray school, Thos. Scroggie teacher, carried off most of the honors and the Maple Grove school was second. Marked improvement could be seen in the work of the girls, twenty-two winning prizes.

HOW TO INVEST MONEY.

Exercise the Same Care You Would in Buying a House.

One who has money to invest should know something of what he is buying. Whether he is a mere amateur and would have a better chance to win if he played a game of cards for money. All gambling is reprehensible, though it must be conceded that speculation in a measure is gambling. But this might be said of the purchase of real estate or any commodity of a changeable value.

Let the investor make a study of business conditions. Watch the earnings of the corporations and the ways as reported in the newspapers. Note the trend of trade. Observe the transactions in prominent securities on the Stock Exchange and have knowledge of what is going on. Exercise the same care that you would in buying a horse, an automobile, a wagon or a house.

Fortunes have been made by those who have pursued this method, and fortunes lost by those who have simply gone into speculation as if they were throwing dice. I well recall the era of railroad and industrial changes, some over twenty years ago, when no body waited to buy stocks and everybody wanted to sell. Those who pick up on the "corpses," as they were then called, and held them until prosperity revived, made handsome profits, in some instances realizing more than ten times what they paid.—Jasper in Leslie's.

The Paper They Were Written On.

The average author would probably laugh at the statement that at one time in the world's history manuscripts, simply as such, irrespective of the nature of the text, were immensely valuable. In ancient times manuscripts were important articles from a commercial point of view. They were excessively scarce and were preserved with the utmost care. Even the owners were glad to lend money on them when the owners were obliged to offer them in pawn. It is related in an ancient tome that a student of Pavia, who was reduced by his debauchery, raised a new fortune by leaving in pawn a manuscript of a body of law and a grammarian who was ruined by a fire relieved his losses with two small volumes of Cicero through the medium of the pawnbroker.

DIAMONDS FOR A DRUNK

By
H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1915, by W. G. Chapman.)

Vanderbuiten, the big Dutchman, stepped about the downcountry train from Kimberley, South Africa, en route for Cape Town. He laid his suit case decisively upon the rack, placed his hand upon his breast to make sure that the package for which he had risked many years of freedom, was there, and sat down in a seat, looking out at the desert landscape.

At Boshof a stranger came into the train, looked keenly about him and finally, spotting Vanderbuiten, seated himself opposite him. Vanderbuiten recognized him as a man named James, from Kimberley also, he had once been a mine guard, but had been dismissed for some dishonesty. He had contrived in some way to avoid the clutches of the law, always severe on buyers of diamonds from the native quarrymen.

Vanderbuiten nodded surlily. James was the last person in the world that he wanted to see just then.

James smiled sardonically. "Come into the smoker, Van," he said, "and we can discuss business."

Vanderbuiten uttered an oath and his hand stole in a betraying manner to the pocket inside his coat. He saw James' eyes follow the movement and realized that he was trapped. Suddenly he arose and accompanied him.

"Well?" he growled as they took their places in the smoking compartment.

"Halves!" said James, laconically. "I'm fly."

"Curse you!" said Vanderbuiten.

"It's a lucky thing you met me," returned James quietly. "Know Mr. Thompson of the Kimberley police?"

"What of him?"

"He's in the next compartment. He's undoubtedly waiting to arrest you as soon as you step off the train. If he can get you off quietly, without doing so, he will save himself a lot of trouble. That's why I came—I got wind of the affair."

The big Dutchman scowled fearfully. Seven years in the penal settlement for illicit diamond buying was the last thing in the world that he wanted. And the stones in his breast pocket were worth twelve thousand pounds anywhere.

"What's the game?" he demanded.

"Halves!" repeated James.

"I suppose so."

The two disembarked for two saddle horses to wait at Kliptonfeld station. We'll get there at dark. We can evade a dash from the train, based on a wire away before Thompson spots us. The saddlehorses are loaded with a week's food. In three days we can cross the desert to Kiaama's Land, where we can pick up an ox wagon and make our way into Johannesburg. Thompson will be clean off the scent. It will take him a couple of hours to find a horse, and he won't know for sure that we are going to Kiaama's Land.

"I'm with you," replied Vanderbuiten, curtly.

At Kliptonfeld the program was carried out. As the train drew, shrieking, up to the station, the comfortable-looking Jones the carriage. At the rear of the platform a native man was waiting with two saddle horses, loaded with blanket rolls, or ten sized tins, would carry their loads where no European horse could go. Two leaps into the saddles, two pulls at the reins and the thieves were paddling quickly through the main street of the settlement and out into the desert.

They looked back when they reached the sand. In the distance they saw a crowd gathered about a tall man who was making futile efforts to secure a quick bargain for a horse.

They rode till evening. When the moon came up they were alone upon the desert. They dismounted, made a fire from the scanty thorn scrub and cooked some of the meat in James' saddle bags. On either side of their idle bung a large water bag, the moisture from which, evaporating, kept the contents cold as spring water. They watered the horses scantily. They watched by turns and satisfied our at water pool, where the water bags were to be refilled.

"I believe we've missed the pool," said James, toward noon. All around than was the shimmering desert, devoid now even of thorn scrub. The horses panted from the heat. James gave them the last of the water.

"We'll strike another water hole before dark," he said to his companion.

But they did not strike the water hole, and by sunset the horses were unable to proceed farther. James' was down, and Vanderbuiten's steed trembling, and evidently on its last legs.

"We and better press on afoot," said James. "I know there is a water hole at the foot of the mountains. And he pointed to where the blue outlines of a distant range rose against the cloudless sky.

He removed his saddle bags and slung them across his shoulders, and the two men proceeded wearily. James leaped behind Vanderbuiten, who, terrified by thirst, walked like a man in a nightmare. On they went, hour after hour, till suddenly the big Dutchman went down.

"You'd best leave me; I'm done for," he murmured.

James set down his saddle bags, opened them, and pulled out a bottle of water. He held it to the star. Vanderbuiten leaped to his feet, to find himself looking down the muzzle of a revolver.

"Hand over the bag," said James, briefly.

"You scoundrel!" shouted Vanderbuiten through his swollen lips.

"This bottle for your half," James pursued. "And—I know where to find the water hole."

Vanderbuiten glared at him; then, with a gesture of despair, he took the precious bag from his breast and issued it to the caterer. For a man will give all that he has to save his life.

Next moment Vanderbuiten had knocked the head off the bottle and was gulping down the life-giving fluid. James watched him sardonically.

"You will find the water hole half a mile distant, at the foot of that elevation," he said, indicating a hummock in the sand. And he watched Vanderbuiten stagger away.

He went back to the horses and, knocking the heads off the other bottles, poured the contents down their throats. The animals, revived, staggered to their feet. His own horse was floor for, but Vanderbuiten's seemed capable of carrying him to the mountain—another water hole along the wagon route across the desert, which he knew like a book.

He changed the diamonds to his breast as he rode, and chuckled. The scheme had been an excellent one and had worked out better than he could have expected. He had heard in Kimberley, by the power chance, that Vanderbuiten intended to go down country. He himself had never dared to purchase diamonds from the natives, but he knew Vanderbuiten's reputation as a successful and daring thief, and it had occurred to him that there was a splendid opportunity of compelling the man to share his plunder with him.

The advent upon the scene of Inspector Thompson had been a little disconcerting, but the same chance which had told him of Vanderbuiten's intention had given him information that the police were on the man's trail. He had then telegraphed to Kliptonfeld for the two horses—and everything had gone like clockwork.

It was no wonder that he chuckled. Looking back he could see the horse still from the sand, and Vanderbuiten, a tiny figure under the moon, staggering painfully back. His own plans could not fail him. He would strike the water hole, refresh himself and his steed, and then proceed in a leisurely manner toward the wagon path.

At last he reached the place. He shackled his horse to a tere tree and climbed the ascent toward the hollow crater in which lay the pool. But when he reached the summit he found himself staring down into a dry mud hole.

The water had dried up under the influence of the hot sun and an unusually long dry season.

For a few minutes he could not believe his eyes. Then he lost his self-control. He would have to go back to Vanderbuiten. And his bottles were empty. He was parched with thirst, and his animal was incapable of proceeding farther.

For hours he raved beside the water hole, cursing his luck. He spared the diamonds in a little heap before him and looked at the dull pebbles, each one worth a little fake or wealth. And for all these he could not get so much water as would wet his tips.

At last he went back to Vanderbuiten." he muttered, and flung himself upon the rocks. When I am rested."

But nature, outraged, revenged herself upon him by drawing down his eyelids, and he slept profoundly.

"Get up, James!"

He started to his feet. The sun was high in the sky. Before him stood Vanderbuiten and—Inspector Thompson.

"I want you, James," said the Inspector, fingering the bag of diamonds, which he had taken from beside the sleeping man. "I thought Vanderbuiten was the man; I was after, but—well, you understand. Your horse is dead, but you won't mind a little walk of twenty-five miles or so? You see, we've got plenty of water."

Fat Not a Disease.

The notion that fat is a disease grew solely out of the fact that after death from certain chronic and lingering diseases various important tissues of the body, such as the heart muscle, the liver, the kidneys and more rarely the kidney, were found largely changed into fat. In our pompous Latinity, they had underdone fatty degeneration. In the good old days of ignorance we had no better sense than to say that this state of affairs was the cause of death, instead of a serious fat had, so to speak, choked and taken the place of the higher and more valuable active tissue.

—"Woolner's Tip."

The little tip or point that often appears in the newly folded margin of the human ear near the top has received the name of "Woolner's Tip," from the sculptor Woolner, who first reproduced it in his bust of Darwin. Other sculptors, though they must have noticed the tip, never reproduced it. Darwin had that little tip, and a remnant of a wrinkle left by the coiling up of the ear, and hence a proof of man's descent from lower animals.

Miss Stonehouse, whose high-bred type of beauty carries off the splendid things in clothes, seems fitted to masquerade as silken-robed princesses and queens pictured in romances of long ago. The strenuous life of the footlights lime actress is not reflected in the calm eyes and serene brow that the "fans" know so well in the actress of the stage drama.

To her type belong just the sort of clothes in which we catch a glimpse of her through the eye of the camera. Her cloak, or mantle, of a rich, high luster silk, is made of a weave so supple that it is easy to reveal a graceful carriage in it. It falls and clings and adapts itself to each motion of the wearer.

This silk has a brocaded surface and is woven in many colors, but is most beautiful in rose or blue and in copper shades. But in any color the brocaded surface and the lustrous weave allow a fascinating play of color.

The big midsummer hat is a picturesque shape with a wide brim made of chiffon having a broad border of leghorn braid. Narrow black chamois fully lace outlines the flange of leghorn where it is set on to the chiffon. And the underbrim is faced with chiffon which allows the black lace to show through. The round crown is set on the brim without a band.

A beautiful wreath of moss roses and buds and an occasional huge pansy blossom make up the decoration of the crown. They are wonderful copies of the natural flowers. A bow of wide velvet ribbon with long hanging ends is tacked against the underbrim at the back. A spray of the moss roses buds and a single pansy make up a bouquet that is sewed to the long ends of velvet about midway of their length.

This is an elegant example of the picturesque in millinery which is carried well by women of the type of Miss Stonehouse or other tall, youthful wearers to whom large hats are becoming. Those who possess leghorns are fortunate; they are in great demand and are among the easiest of hats to rebleach or remodel as may be desired.

Novelties in Dress Accessories

New shopping bags fancier than those of leather and new cosmic in odd shapes are among the latest of novelties in accessories of dress that are allurinely displayed in the shops. In the picture given here two of these bags are shown, together with a comb. The bags are mounted on the new clasp, which has been christened the "Panama date." It spreads when pulled out to open the mouth of the bag, and when pressed to close it fits under a cap of metal.

At the left the long bag is made of gold-colored moire ribbon of a heavy, soft quality. This is gathered to a flat bag made of gold beads, having a flowered pattern in beads of various color and finished at the bottom with a tasseled fringe of beads. The clasp is of French gilt and the cap is of the same.

At the right the bag is made of black moire ribbon in a fine quality mounted on a clasp of gunmetal. It is lined with a flowered silk in lavender and the cap which confines the clasp is of gunmetal set with an amethyst. The small coin purse of silk is attached to the bag by a fine chain of gunmetal. Foot Comfort.

The more the feet are bathed and rubbed the more comfort you will have. Rubbing the soles of the feet with a raw lemon is very restful after the bath. Keep the toenail cut straight across, never cut crescent in the shape, and the nails around the nails should be kept loose. A strong hot salt bath is very restful for the feet.

Heart Pincushion.

The most attractive little pincushion to hang by the side of the dresser can be made with two heart-shaped pieces of Hardanger canvas.

Embroider a wreath of pink roses and leaves and cross-stitch on wrong side, leaving an opening at the top.

Turn and fill with bird's wool, then top sew the opening and add a loop of pink ribbon to the center top, so that the little rose heart can be suspended by the side of the dressing table.

Turkey feathers are being mounted with gold and pearl and peacock arts iocratic fans.

WILLINGLY GAVE LIVES

HEROISM OF JAPANESE IN SIEGE OF PEKING.

Well Had to Be Destroyed, and They Were Ready to Do It, the Cost Being Of No Consideration.

Among the few veterans living in Philadelphia who took part in the Spanish-American war and who were present at the raising of Peking in Provinces Mrs. Williams and Williams passed through the stirring scenes incident to the occupation of the Philippine islands as a marine, when he gets to talking of his military days he generally selects those connected with the conquest of China and particularly with the taking of Peking.

One story of heroic self-sacrifice, as told by Williams, is as follows.

"You are we had gone up to Peking without artillery. The country was rough and hilly and it was not considered practical to transport even the lighter guns. That a mistake was made in not doing so soon became evident after we began the siege. A twenty-pounder of any description would have solved the problem in half an hour. As it was, there we lay within easy distance of the walls of the city, and although several attempts to take them by storm were made, they all resulted in failure.

"Well, something had to be done. It was impossible to send back for artillery even if it could have been brought up, and so the Japs selected to solve the problem. They went to work manfully and boldly.

"The first attempt, and the second and third failed. For every time the Japs had their bomb placed and the fuse sputtering the Boxers would succeed in pushing them away far enough so that when they exploded they did no harm. It began to look after the second or third time as though some reason would have to be devised. And this then they took place a little longer than once between several of the Japanese officers. They talked for a while and pretty soon one of them approached a Japanese company and said some the natural flowers. A bow of wide velvet ribbon with long hanging ends is tacked against the underbrim at the back. A spray of the moss roses buds and a single pansy make up a bouquet that is sewed to the long ends of velvet about midway of their length.

This is an elegant example of the picturesque in millinery which is carried well by women of the type of Miss Stonehouse or other tall, youthful wearers to whom large hats are becoming. Those who possess leghorns are fortunate; they are in great demand and are among the easiest of hats to rebleach or remodel as may be desired.

TELLING the FARMER WHAT TO DO AND HOW TO DO IT

By EDWARD B. CLARK

Staff Correspondent of the WESTERN NEWSPAPER UNION

CARL VROOMAN, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

DAVID HOUSTON SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

WASHINGTON—For nearly two years there has been an attempt on the part of the agricultural department to spread useful agricultural and household information among the people through the medium of the press of the country. The scheme has been highly successful, as pretty near the readers of newspapers do not need to be told, for the interesting and and at times compelling writings of the service men have been taken from day to day in the press.

In the department of agriculture there is an office of information which was created in 1913. Before its establishment there had been no active effort to give directly to the people the results of the department's work. Walter H. Page, at present the American ambassador to Great Britain, said on this subject of getting agricultural information to the people that the department "Had been reserving an enormous mass of information collected with the people's money, and which the people were entitled to get."

In the past there were issued at frequent intervals publications largely in bulletin form, but with the exception of more or less perfunctory notice of their appearances comparatively little was done to make the public aware that they were issued or at all. One of the first things that the office of information did, therefore, was to develop a system by which the information contained in these bulletins could be put in a form and manner which it was deemed reasonable to expect from the nature of the various subjects would be acceptable to the readers of them for the sake of their readers. This work still forms a large part of the activities of the office.

Some time ago there was a criticism of what were called the publicity efforts of the department of agriculture. The critics did not understand at all the nature of the work which was being done. They seemed to think that a press agency had been established simply for the purpose of boosting the activities of the agricultural department with a view, perhaps, as some of the critics may have thought, of saying something kindly occasionally about the officials of government concerned in the work. Criticism passed quickly, for congress was told in a letter to Speaker Champ Clark of the house of representatives of just what the information work of the department consisted, and a sharp line was drawn between the satire of the information which was being sent out and the usual stuff which is turned out by a publicity bureau which is not at all necessarily an information bureau.

In a letter to the speaker of the house the secretary of agriculture said:

"The nation is spending through the department many millions of dollars in acquiring agricultural information. It would be little short of criminal to spend millions of dollars in acquiring information and not to use every possible efficient agency available for placing it at the disposal of the people in promoting their welfare. It is the purpose of the office [the office of information], with as little delay as possible, through every proper medium, to give the knowledge which the department possesses as the result of investigations in the field work to all the people who desire it or should have it. The office undertakes to deal solely with facts, with suggestions of remedies, and of methods of applying them to every field of agriculture."

Prior to the time that the office of information was created nearly all the printed matter conveying information was in the form of bulletins and circulars. This form of publication was not very voluminous. Frequently a great deal of time was required for the office of publication to prepare it and to distribute it. It was inevitable for many reasons that these bulletins would not reach the great mass of the people who would be interested in them. Many farmers did not know such reports were issued, or their dispositions. They knew nothing about the bulletins or which ones of them would be helpful to them, or how they know how to secure them. Moreover, the publications largely were technical, and the effort to interpret, to understand and to apply.

One of the particular duties of the department is to disseminate information that has been which comes from the different bureaus in technical or scientific language which the ordinary readers can understand. It seemed easier and better to the department officials that the office of information should choose the matter of special value to particular districts or sections of the Union and to the interests of those in such sections quickly. It had been found that delay in issuing the official printed bulletins and in making them often defeated the ends of real service. In case of the appearance in some district of an insect plague or of a disease that threatened the great, quick action, of course, it was realized was necessary to accomplish results.

The inauguration of the service of information is to a great extent a matter of organization and efficient mailing system which would enable the office of circulate its material among those classes of publications and in those sections of the country which could derive benefit from it, and at the same time provide a distribution that would be expensive to the government and useless to the newspapers and, if they should publish it, to their readers.

Now there is a mailing system installed and under operation by the office of information and by means of it the publications of the country are classified geographically and by their character. Now it is possible to transmit a story to all the newspapers in a single state, to all the newspapers in any city or group of cities, to all the farm publications in the country, or to any other class of publication or publications, to the trade papers of any one or all of the trades, to daily newspapers in a single state, or to those in small county seats alone—in short, practically any desired combination of publications is possible.

From the time the office of information was created the office of information has been in attempt on the part of the agricultural department to spread useful agricultural and household information among the people through the medium of the press of the country. THE LITHOGRAPHIC ROOM

LABORATORY IN THE BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY

WATCHING FOOT AND MOUTH CONDITIONS

From the one clipping bureau and that these afford only a rough kind of information of the extent of the use of the matter. All calculations, however, have been made and it is perhaps likely that they are under-rather than over the mark. It is believed that before the outbreak of the European war the material furnished by the information office appeared every month on approximately 300,000,000 printed pages. At the outbreak of the last Bulletin issued about twelve months after the information service had been established, the division of publications made report to the secretary of agriculture that the Bulletin for Farmers' Bulletins was 44 per cent greater than during the previous fiscal year. Of course a certain proportion of this increase must be laid to the increased number of publications and to the increased population, but making all allowances it seems to be plain that the public was much better informed about the existence of the bulletins and much more interested in them than over it had been before.

While the department extends the usefulness of the farmers' bulletins among the people by familiarizing them with the publications contents and value, it also seeks to it that stories are prepared for publication that are much more strictly news from the point of view of the newspaper editors. These stories are usually warnings of frauds or of pestilence, or decisions and announcements connected with the enforcement of the meat inspection and food and drugs act and other statutes of regulation which are administered by the department of agriculture.

In the days before the creation of the office of information the only organized method of spreading the news of this character, which is almost always of considerable and even great commercial importance, was to send it out through the mails in the form of circulars. The delay frequently was costly to the people and the interests concerned and it was necessarily unsatisfactory.

Under the present system information is sent out at once from the department's office by telegraph or messenger to the press associations and to representatives of newspapers which are likely to be interested in the matter and who are within reach.

The usefulness of this work is shown to the prompt publication of every quarantine order affecting the foot-and-mouth disease. This subject, however, had attained such proportions that it is likely the newspapers themselves would have secured the information through their own representatives, but there are other cases and many of them, where the stories could not be secured because the department did not give out the information voluntarily nothing would be known of it. A case in point which may be cited was an elaborate attempt to palm off on the farmers in the north half region a preparation alleged to cure hog cholera. The sellers pretended that the preparation was recommended by the department of agriculture. This fraud was suppressed when through the office of information the newspapers in the territory concerned received a full statement of the facts in the case.

Many of the department's activities, moreover, have to do, not with the farmer, but with those who manufacture products into food or handle stores, or markets them. The department's specialists are constantly making discoveries for preventing losses, devising methods for manufacturing new products or improved methods for handling or manufacturing old products. Heretofore it frequently happened that one progressive manufacturer would learn of these things and thus gain an advantage over others in the same trade, who had no knowledge that the information was available. Under the present system the office of information quickly communicates the details of these discoveries or improvements to all trade papers in the class affected and to all interested dailies in the territories where such manufacture is a prominent industry.

The office of information in addition to the service of the character outlined prepares a "Weekly News Letter" to crop correspondents which has taken the place of the "Crop Reporter." This "Weekly News Letter" is sent to all the voluntary crop correspondents serving the department, to inspectors, agricultural colleges, correspondents, and to other persons who request to make use of the material. It has a circulation approximately of 100,000 weekly.

In all the work of the office of information the effort is made to place at the disposal of the people the information which the department of agriculture primarily was organized to obtain for their benefit. In none of the material is there any attempt to gain prominence for any individual or branch of government or to praise or to criticize anyone or in any way to influence legislation.

IRON A FACTOR IN HEALTH

Science Has Proved Iron Is Highly Necessary in the Production of Red Blood.

Iron should play an important part in preparing meals. It is essential to the making of red corpuscles of the blood and is directly concerned with the processes of oxidation and reproduction.

The iron of the food enters the circulation and is deposited mainly in the liver, the spleen and the bone marrow.

Iron may be taken as a medicine and sometimes the deficiency of hemoglobin and red blood corpuscles, had the better to get it if possible directly through food and water.

The amount of iron needed appears to be varied with different individuals, depending on the nature of their work, diet and the climatic conditions and changes. Careful experiments have shown that the average man under normal conditions requires about fifteen milligrams of iron per day. The average woman is supposed to require about eighteen. Iron is as much food as a man and the same proportion of iron will suffice. A child that needs half as much food requires the same proportion of iron.

As long as infants are drinking milk they get only a small amount of iron, but it is interesting to know that a sufficient has been stored in their systems at birth to tide them over until they are ready for the iron in the share of iron. Beefsteak and some vegetables are rich in iron.

In meat the iron exists largely as hemoglobin, due to the blood contained in the muscular tissue. Iron in combination with protein matter is found in considerable quantity in grains. String beans, navy dried beans, spinach, asparagus, cabbage and dried peas are rich in iron. Among the fruits that have plenty of iron are dried prunes, apples and raisins.

Borrowed money soon begins to look like borrowed trouble.

NEEDED SUPPLY OF TENORS

Impresario's Explanation, However, Was Unsatisfactory to Singers He Had Engaged.

A young singer who had been singing for doors work had the good fortune to be engaged by an impresario for a tour through South America. His chest swelled with pride as he walked the deck of the steamer that was to take him on his first trip to foreign lands. On the second morning out he was much surprised to meet an old classmate, who, like himself, was a tenor singer.

"Well, well, where are you from? Where are you going?" each asked the other.

And each answered: "I'm engaged by an opera company for a South American tour."

"My manager is on this steamer," said one.

"And mine, too."

Within five minutes both singers found that they had been engaged by the same opera company for the same tour. "What does the man mean by hiring two different men for the role of first tenor?" asked one.

"Pardon me," interrupted a youth who had been standing near, and overheard their conversation. "You have myself and two other young singers for companions in this affair. We have just found to our surprise that we have all been engaged by the same man for the same part on the same tour. What under the sun can he mean by having five first tenors?"

The five youths took counsel together, and decided that they would see the manager and demand an explanation.

They found him on the forward deck. He listened, seemingly unmoved, at their complaint, and said: "Gentlemen, don't you worry. I am an old and experienced man in this game, and know what I am doing. If you were accustomed to the climate of South America, you would know yourselves that it is absolutely necessary. We shall scarcely arrive there before three or four of you fellows will be stricken with the deadly tropical fever. Experience has taught me all my tropical tours to allow for all sorts of mishaps and misfortunes. Of course, you can see what essential benefits are afforded to the chap who is able to withstand everything." And with those words the manager retired to his cabin.

The five young singers then sat down and debated the "excellent prospects." They soon came to a decision. One chance in five is better a star singer instead of a dead one. Six weeks passed by uneventfully. So when the steamer stopped at Liverpool, the youths were ashore, and the impresario never saw them again.—Youth's Companion.

Mourning in London.

"Like every other human institution," says the London Globe, "the wearing of mourning may be carried to an extreme, as it was during the last century, when it became so ostentatious that the inevitable reaction took place, synchronizing naturally with the spiritual reawakening that began silently years ago, and has developed so wonderfully in these days of storm and stress. The spiritual minded do not fear death, in whatever guise it comes; do not abandon themselves to violent grief, nor assume hasty weeds. Yet mourning attire is widely and rightly worn today, in memory and honor of our heroes who have fought and died for us. Quite a decorous set pro parte court, and no less sweet and seemly is it that we should show by our garb how deep is our sorrow for what we feel. Even those who have not suffered bereavement, whose kinsfolk and friends so far have won through, safely, feel irresistibly impelled to wear more or less somber attire, in sympathy with their mourning sisters. For the private grief of an individual is shared by the whole nation."

Restoring Fatigued Muscles.

A very ingenious physiological method of increasing the vitality of a boy from any given group of muscles is described in the Deutsche Medizin according to an abstract in Die Umschau, the author, Th. Weber, claims that he generates a gain of from 30 to 40 per cent in obtainable in the amount of work done. The device is extremely simple. When the given group of muscles has reached the point of exhaustion, due to the accumulation of the products of fatigue, they are allowed to rest, while an entirely different muscle group is set to work vigorously. The energetic contraction of these muscles causes an increase in heart action and circulation, and the strengthened current of blood thus sent to all parts of the body partially restores the working power of the first group of muscles by carrying away fatigue toxins and supplying oxygen.

Historic Cemetery to Go.

A cemetery which was laid out in 1652, the year of the foundation of the settlement of the village of Newtown, in which are buried the ancestors of many of the leading families in New York, is to be wiped out by the extension of a street, and then some 60 the wealthy descendants of the pioneers of Newtown come to the rescue the bodies will all be reburied in the Jewish burying ground on Hart's Island. Among the graves in the old burying ground are those of Jonathan and Elizabeth Poh, the grandparents of Stuyvesant and Hamilton Fish of New York and Rev. John Moore, the first minister in Newtown, who died in 1657, is buried in the plot.

"Wooden Russia."

The name "Wooden Russia" is the popular one given to that vast forest area of Russia in Europe, which covers 451,568,000 acres, or 36 per cent of the entire area of the country. Yet some few in Russia, with the country may be delivered through the carelessness of private owners, and the imperial government is considering steps for the reforestation of the forests. In Russia the houses built of any material other than wood are almost unknown outside the cities, and wood constitutes the principal fuel.

How Englishman Raised Money for Soldiers.

New Idea for the Collection of Relief Funds—War Talk Fined, and of Course No Two Books of Anything Else.

I came across Crawshaw in the road unexpectedly. I would rather meet a rate collector than Crawshaw. He is the most dangerous beggar in England.

He would induce a blind crossing sweeper to guarantee half a crown a week to a foreign relief fund. If one he were chancellor of the exchequer people would almost like paying income tax.

"Good morning, old man," I said trying to dodge by him.

"Just the man I was looking for," said Crawshaw. "I want you."

"My dear fellow," I began, "I can't possibly afford—"

"I don't want your money," interrupted Crawshaw.

"Well, you've got all my spare blankets, underclothing and old noses."

"Poor old chap," said the brother. "He told me to give his widow as much as I was sure he would give for myself."

"Precisely," responded the rabbit. "You took a wager and gave the widow $10,000. Therefore, you wanted $40,000 for your own relations. Give my wife as much as you want? Why, I'm a married man, give her $46,000. Furthermore, did not your brother say: 'Keep the remainder?' Why, you ever feel sure that such attacks coming on, you had better come right down to the place where the money is known, and we will take care of you?"

WAR PREVENTION WORLD COURT AIM

Congress to Organize at Cleveland, May 12.

WM. H. TAFT ON PROGRAM.

Committee Headed by John Mays Hammond Not to Deal With Present Conflict, but to Devise Means of Establishing Supreme Arbitration Board of International Justice.

Plans for holding a world court congress at Cleveland, O., May 12, 13 and 14 are announced by the organization of one hundred, under whose auspices it is being arranged. Comprising the committee are many prominent men of societies, educational institutions and civic organizations.

For weeks the holding of this congress has been unannounced by a statement issued by Hon. John Hays Hammond, M. E. Ingersoll, president of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, who is the president of the committee of one hundred, under whose auspices the congress will be held. The following is the statement issued by Mr. Ingersoll:

"The project of a true international court of justice has been definitely launched. It was adopted in principle by the forty-four nations represented at the Hague conference 1907, was matured by the International Law association, and has the support of a committee of one hundred representative of all the leading powers, including Great Britain and Germany. It has been so beautifully studied at four annual conferences of the American Society For Judicial Settlement of International Disputes and by Peace societies, universities and publicists. The association has also built up the support of state legislatures in the United States, of leading chambers of commerce and of thousands of leading men. Its plan is approved by thoughtful men everywhere.

"Practical men are now on taking about projects when their desirability and practicability are more demonstrated. They insist upon seeing them realized. The project of the court is a matter of fact. The time has come to take positive action looking toward its prompt establishment at the right moment. That it will be established is a matter of time. The future belongs to the peace makers. That it will hold up international law as essential to peaceful relations among men, is equally assured.

Present Methods Weak.

The present unspeakable conflict abroad has brought with it a vivid conception of the inadequacy of our present methods. We are now publicly we look in the interest of peace to the development of a more effective or better organization of the world.

With a view to rousing the American public to a consideration of the possibilities that lie in the creation of a tribunal of justice for the nation and developing an insistent demand for it, the committee of one hundred has invited a number of most representative friends and advocates of the judicial settlement of international controversies. As the result of three conferences the world court committee was organized for the purpose of declaring world's final decree of establishing a supreme court of the world.

It is not the thought of the committee nor the purpose of the congress to deal with the present war situation. The movement contemplates the establishment of judicial machinery at the close of the war as the one necessary evidence of preventing future wars. In the organization of the committee it was agreed that but one question should be discussed at the open-acting congress—viz. the judicial settlement plan.

Hammond Is Chairman.

John Hays Hammond was selected as chairman on account of his practical business sense, his diplomatic temperament and his personal acquaintance with most of the rulers of the world. Dr. John Wesley Hill, president International Peace Forum, is secretary of the executive committee.

On Wednesday, May 12, a luncheon will be tendered the delegates by the chamber of commerce of Cleveland. At 3 p. m. following the organization of the congress, addresses of welcome will be made by Governor Willis, the mayor of Cleveland, and the president of the chamber of commerce, at 8 p. m. for the discussion of "The Relation of the International Court to the Settlement of Industrial Disputes," the subject will be discussed by John Mitchell of the American Federation of Labor, Dr. John Wesley Hill, Frederick P. Lynch, secretary of the Church Peace union, General Bullington Booth of the American Volunteers, and Dr. Francis E. Clark, president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor.

The meetings will be held in the Central armory and Chamber of Commerce auditorium.

Many Noted Speakers.

Among those who have accepted invitations to address the congress are William Howard Taft, Judge Alton B. Parker, Hon. John Wesley Hill, John Hays Hammond, Governor Frank B. Willis, charles H. Warren of Detroit, Senator Lawrence Y. Sherman of Illinois, Senator Warren G. Harding of Ohio, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, President Jewish W. Jones, Bishop Alexander Coltby, Rabbi Joseph Silverman, Dr. Frederick Lynch, Hon. Theodore Burton, Henry Cowen, Dr. Albert Shaw, John Mitchell, Professor Samuel T. Dutton, Hon. Charles Brown Scott, Thomas Hasburn White and Freeman McMillin.

Tells of Its Objects.

In announcing the congress the general committee makes the following statement as to its objects:

The project of a true international court of justice has been definitely launched. Warrington and Jimmie are "Parrot & Co." Jimmie for Elsa and Wade Hampton get together on the river. Martha, Elsa's chaperon, learns for that there is possible in Hampton Warrington banks and Jimmie and Elsa are married. Orphans and Brothers in a new one-act.

CHAPTER VI.

In the Next Room.

"Crale!" Warrington whispered the word, as if he feared the world might hear the deadly menace in his voice. For murder leaped up in Martha's face as fears leaps up in false alarm.

The weird young man got to his knees, then to his feet. He steadied himself by clutching the back of a chair. With one hand he felt of his throat tenderly.

"He tried to kill me, the blackguard," he croaked.

"Crale, it is you! For ten years I've never thought of you without murder in my heart. Newell Craig, and here, right where I can put my hands upon you! Oh, this old world is small," Warrington laughed. It was a high, thin sound.

The young man looked from his enemy to his deliverer, and back again. "Was now you was this?" asked he before had he seen the blackguard with enough to his dark handsome, predatory face. It mightilies and who was this big, blond chap whose fingers were working so convulsively?

"Crale," said the young man, "you get out of here, and if you ever come bothering me, I'll shoot you. Hear me."

This direful threat did not seem to stir the sense of hearing in either of the two men. Suddenly the blond man caught the door and swung it wide.

"Crale, a week ago I'd have throttled you without one the least compunction. Today I can't touch you. But get out of here as fast as you can. You might have gone free foremost. Go! Out of Rangoon, too. I may change my mind."

The man called Craig walked out, securing his shoulders with a touch of bravado that did not impress even the plucked pigeon. Warrington stood listening until he heard the hall door close sharply.

"Martha," said the bewildered youth. Warrington whirled upon him savagely. "Thanks! Don't thank me. you weak-kneed fool!"

"Oh, I say, now!" the other protested.

"Be silent! If you owe that scoundrel anything, refuse to pay it. He never earned a penny in his life without cheating. Keep out of his way; keep out of the way of all men who prefer to deal only two hands." And with the words he flung out the door.

Warrington's appearance that afternoon astonished Elsa. She had anticipated some change, but scarcely such elegance. He was, without question, one of the handsomest men she had ever met. He was handsomer than Arthur because he was more manly in type. What a mystery he was! She greeted him cordially, without restraint; but for all that, a little silver stirred the tendrils of hair at the nape of her neck.

"The most famous man in Rangoon today," she said, smiling.

"So you have read that tommy-rot in the newspaper!"

They sat on her private balcony, under an awning. Rain was threatening. Martha laid aside her knitting and did her utmost to give her smile of welcome an air of graciousness.

"I shouldn't call it tommy-rot," Elsa declared. "It was not classic. It was black and foresight. Men who possess those two attributes get about everything worth having."

"There are exceptions," studying the fortune of his cane.

"Is there really anything you want now and can't have?

Martha looked at her charge in dread and wonder.

"There is the moon," he answered. "I have always wanted that. But there it hangs, just as far out of reach as ever."

Elsa's curiosity today was keenly alive. She wanted to ask a thousand questions, but the ease with which the man wore his new clothes, used his voice and eyes and hands, convinced her more than ever that the subtlest suggestion she might devise would not stir him into any confession. That he had once been a gentleman of her own class, and more, something of an exquisite, there remained no doubt in her mind. What had he done? What in the world had he done?

On his part, he regretted the presence of Martha; for, so strongly had this girl worked upon his imagination

"What a beauty!" she exclaimed. "Of course I'll accept it. It is very kind of you. I am horribly fond of such things. Thank you. How easily it slips over my finger!"

"Chinamen have very slender fingers," he explained. "Good-by. Those characters say 'Good luck and prosperity.'"

No expressed desire of wishing to meet again, just an affable, carelessly farewell; and she liked him all the better for his apparent lack of sentiment.

"Good-by," she said. She winced, for his name was rough-jammed and strong.

A little later she saw him pass down the street. He never turned and looked back.

"And why," asked Martha, "did you not tell the man that we sail on the same ship?"

"You're a simpleton, Martha." Elsa turned the ring round and round on her finger. "If I had told him, he would have cancled his sailing and taken another boat."

CHAPTER VII.

Confidences.

That night Martha wrote a letter. During the writing of it she jumped at every sound; a footstep in the hall, the slamming of a door, a voice calling in the street. And yet, Martha was guilty of performing only what she considered to be her bounden duty.

My Dear Mr. Arthur: I do not know if you are fond of it. His disease is one to the over indulgent. He is a little bigger and bronzier and he wears a little mustache. That's all the difference. When he came on the boat that day he was like a man with a bone in his throat. And you know how romantic I am. I'm sure you will be pleased. I am certain that she sees you in this manner when she reads your letter. If only you had had the foresight to write to her before! Oh, dear! And now I'm going to tell you a secret. Don't let it down to Blengent. I don't like it. Mr. Warrington is coming to the ball. What if she did forbid you to follow? Women do not understand what they do. I know. You should have followed. Another year, and he will be like, what the man has done to make himself a little interesting. Years and years will behave himself like a gentleman. Oh, I know what I am saying. I know what I am talking about. I am thinking of his past, of his people. We don't even know how they lived. Mr. Arthur, do you know that's a sign that something is wrong? Nobody knows. He never lives by the name of Warrington! I beg you to see that matter. There is no harm in it. I am worried. For Elsa is a puzzle. I think he has been hurt. I think he has been with her since her babyhood. I think he has been her playmate. Oh, I know, you know, was a soldier, of fortune. Well, I know, I know, that he is some statue. Elsa has her father's secret, everything but his name. Always clothed in her mother's impenetrable cloak. That's difficult, too. It is the most adorable creature to me, and I love it. Why have I worry about it? Why have that it would be wise to pass your life and dispose of your dear sweetness, Elsa, to marry Elsa as fast as ever you can.

The day of sailing was brilliant and warm. Elsa sat in a chair on the deck of the tender, watching the passengers as they came aboard. A large tourist party bustled about, rummaged among the heaps of luggage, and shouted questions at their unhappy conductor.

She saw Hoorhly standing in the bow. A steamer trunk, a kit-bag, a bed-ding-bag, and the inevitable parrot cage, reposed at his foot. He was watching without interest or excitement the stream passing up and down the gangplank. If his master came, very well; if he did not, he would get off with the luggage. How she would envy him! Hoorhly was indifferent to his master! Elsa began to offer excuses for her interest in Warrington. He was the counterpart of Arthur Ellison. He had made his fortune against odds. He was a mystery. Why should he interest her? Her mind was not on one man but half a score. She profited him, always wondering what he was back of it all. Hoorhly would be astonished anybody, or shocked them with unexpected pieces of character; and each time she looked at Warrington, Arthur seemed to recede. And when the time came for the guest to take his leave, Martha regretted to find that the major part of her antagonism had gone.

"I wish to thank you, Miss Chetwyn, for your kindness to a very lonely man. It isn't probable that I shall see you again. I sail next Thursday for Singapore." He reached into a pocket. "I wonder if you would consider it an impertinence if I offered you this old trinket?" He held out the mandarin's ring.

"Now, Not a Single Word of This to Anyone."

that he had called with the deliberate intention of telling her everything. But he could not open the gates of his heart before a third person, one he intuitively knew was antagonistic.

Conversation went adrift; pictures and music and the polished capitals of the world, the latest books and plays. The information in regard to these Elsa supplied him. They discussed also the problems of the day as frankly as if they had been in an occidental drawing-room. Martha's tea was bitter. She liked Arthur, who was always charming, who never surprised or astonished anybody, or shocked them with unexpected pieces of character; and each time she looked at Warrington, Arthur seemed to recede. And when the time came for the guest to take his leave, Martha regretted to find that the major part of her antagonism had gone.

"I wish to thank you, Miss Chetwyn, for your kindness to a very lonely man. It isn't probable that I shall see you again. I sail next Thursday for Singapore." He reached into a pocket. "I wonder if you would consider it an impertinence if I offered you this old trinket?" He held out the mandarin's ring.

"Oh, how!" she exclaimed. "Of course I'll accept it. It is very kind of you. I am horribly fond of such things. Thank you. How easily it slips over my finger!"

CHAPTER VII.

Confidences.

That night Martha wrote a letter. During the writing of it she jumped at every sound; a footstep in the hall, the slamming of a door, a voice calling in the street. And yet, Martha was guilty of performing only what she considered to be her bounden duty.

My Dear Mr. Arthur: I do not know if you are fond of it. His disease is one to the over indulgent. He is a little bigger and bronzier and he wears a little mustache. That's all the difference. When he came on the boat that day he was like a man with a bone in his throat. And you know how romantic I am. I'm sure you will be pleased. I am certain that she sees you in this manner when she reads your letter. If only you had had the foresight to write to her before! Oh, dear! And now I'm going to tell you a secret. Don't let it down to Blengent. I don't like it. Mr. Warrington is coming to the ball. What if she did forbid you to follow? Women do not understand what they do. I know. You should have followed. Another year, and he will behave like what the man has done to make himself a little interesting. Years and years will behave himself like a gentleman. Oh, I know what I am saying. I know what I am talking about. I am thinking of his past, of his people. We don't even know how they lived. Mr. Arthur, do you know that's a sign that something is wrong? Nobody knows. He never lives by the name of Warrington! I beg you to see that matter. There is no harm in it. I am worried. For Elsa is a puzzle. I think he has been hurt. I think he has been with her since her babyhood. I think he has been her playmate. Oh, I know, you know, was a soldier, of fortune. Well, I know, I know, that he is some statue. Elsa has her father's secret, everything but his name. Always clothed in her mother's impenetrable cloak. That's difficult, too. It is the most adorable creature to me, and I love it. Why have I worry about it? Why have that it would be wise to pass your life and dispose of your dear sweetness, Elsa, to marry Elsa as fast as ever you can.

The day of sailing was brilliant and warm. Elsa sat in a chair on the deck of the tender, watching the passengers as they came aboard. A large tourist party bustled about, rummaged among the heaps of luggage, and shouted questions at their unhappy conductor.

She saw Hoorhly standing in the bow. A steamer trunk, a kit-bag, a bed-ding-bag, and the inevitable parrot cage, reposed at his foot. He was watching without interest or excitement the stream passing up and down the gangplank. If his master came, very well; if he did not, he would get off with the luggage. How she would envy him! Hoorhly was indifferent to his master! Elsa began to offer excuses for her interest in Warrington. He was the counterpart of Arthur Ellison. He had made his fortune against odds. He was a mystery. Why should he interest her? Her mind was not on one man but half a score. She profited him, always wondering what he was back of it all. Hoorhly would be astonished anybody, or shocked them with unexpected pieces of character; and each time she looked at Warrington, Arthur seemed to recede. And when the time came for the guest to take his leave, Martha regretted to find that the major part of her antagonism had gone.

"I wish to thank you, Miss Chetwyn, for your kindness to a very lonely man. It isn't probable that I shall see you again. I sail next Thursday for Singapore." He reached into a pocket. "I wonder if you would consider it an impertinence if I offered you this old trinket?" He held out the mandarin's ring.

Glamor of Honor Follows the Hours of Fierce and Necessarily Merciless Combat.

Beginning of Great Invention.

As far back as the Crusades there were being made acquaintance with what savants called an "otacoustic," which brought distant sounds to the ear and was a far-off promise of the "long distance" telephone of our own day. Samuel Pepys was abroad in those days, and of course he saw the new out, tried it and mentions it in his diary. He went with Lord Brouncker to "the Royal society," and "here, to my great content, I did try the use of the new invention, which is very good." Pepys was a great glass bottle broke at the bottom, putting the ends to my ears and there I did plainly hear the dancing of the oarss of the boats in the river, which I could not hear before, which without it I did not in the least do."

THE SANDMAN IN STORY

By Max F. A. Walker

DID THE IDOL SAVE TOMMY?

Tommie's Uncle Jim had been a sea captain, and had brought home many curious things. When he was sent to visit his grandmother he always looked at them with great interest. In the old fashioned parlor there was a high mantel, and on it were quaint-looking shells and a whale's tooth. Tommie often thought he would not be afraid to take to bite him.

What interested Tommie most, however, was a queer-looking Chinese idol, with strange grinning eyes and distorted features. Tommie used to look at it and wonder if the people where it came from looked like that.

On either side of the fireplace were long, narrow doors, and Tommie had longed to see the inside, but he never had once been in a room in the parlor he tried to open one of the doors, but he could not. He wondered if it led to back of the chimney or whether it might not be a secret stairway.

There was a haircloth sofa on the opposite side of the room, and some times when the minister called, Tommie went in the parlor with his grandmother. Then he would sit on the sofa and sometimes he would look at the idol, and sometimes he would look at the whale's tooth. Tommie thought the idol looked out of the corner of his eyes when he did made a face at the minister.

Then there were portraits of his grandfather, and his grandmother, and when he went in the parlor alone there was something about as though they were watching to see he did not get into mischief.

One afternoon he was wandering about the house, and opened the parlor door.

It seemed so nice and cool, so warm and so quiet, and Tommie felt so lonesome when he came in front of the mantel he looked at his funny friend and laughed. Then Tommie tried one of the little doors again, but he could not open it. He saw an album and took it to the sofa and opened it. How funny the pictures looked! There was one that looked like his father, but he was sure his father never wore such queer-looking clothes.

Tommie crawled up in the corner of the sofa and looked across at the idol. He seemed to be grinning and winking at him. He did move, Tommie was sure he did. Then he was standing up and beckoning to Tommie. Tommie was over to the mantel.

"Take me down," said the idol.

"I daren't," said Tommie. "Grandmother told me not to handle things on the mantel."

"Well, I'll climb down, then, only you are so much larger that I am you could save me a lot of trouble."

"If you are coming down, anyway," said Tommie, "I'll help you." So he stood up in a chair and took him down.

"Mr. but you are small!" said Tommie, looking down at him.

"Yes, I was big," said the idol, "but an old witch changed me into this little shape. Do you want to see what is on the other side of these doors?" he asked.

"Yes," answered Tommie, "but they are locked."

"Oh, I can open them," said the idol.

"You hold me up to the keyhole."

Tommie did as he told him, and the idol tapped on one of the doors, and it opened. It was very dark inside, but the idol told Tommie to place him on his shoulder and walk along. They came to a flight of steps, which seemed to go under the ground, and Tommie hesitated.

"Go on," said the idol; "you have nothing to fear. Not one hair of your head shall be hurt."

Tommie was so interested in what he saw on the left side that he quite forgot to be afraid, and soon he was standing beside them. They all jumped up and pointed their pistols at him.

"Who are you and what do you want?" they demanded.

Tommie was so frightened he could not tell them, and looked around to the idol for help, but he his surprise he fell on not there.

"Where did you come from?" asked a very large man, who seemed to be the leader. Tommie told him his grandmother lived in the house which was over the cellar, and that he came down from there.

"Please do not shoot me," he said. "the idol told me to come or I should not be hurt."

"Who is the idol?" asked the man. They all laughed when Tommie told them he was the idol, and he told them his story.

"What shall we do with him?" said one.

"Oh, we shall make a robber of him," said another, and then Tommie knew he was in a cave of robbers.

"We will have to stretch our hair to make it as long as ours," said one robber.

"You get the pullers," he told another, "and then we will paint him and cut out his front teeth."

"Tommie" felt his hair rise, and when he saw the man return with the pullers he turned and ran. The men ran after him, but when they reached the steps one of them stumbled, and the others fell over him, and Tommie reached the door and closed it.

He went over and sat on the sofa to get his breath, and there on the mantel sat the idol. Tommie was just about to ask him way he ran away and left him to face the robbers alone, when the door opened, and his grandfather looked in.

"Oh, here you are," he said. "Your grandmother and I have been looking for you. It is supper time."

"Where did you find him?" his grandmother asked, when they were seated at the table.

Tommie told how he had been in the parlor.

"You did not touch anything, did you?" she asked.

"I was looking at the pictures in the album," he answered.

"I am always afraid he will get up mischief," she said to the man of the father. "He cannot take his eyes off that Chinese idol, when he is in there. I would throw it away, if Jim had not brought it home. It looks so evil, but I'm said it keep away bad luck."

And Tommie wondered whether the idol had run from the robbers or whether he had been asleep and dreamed it all.

AERIAL CYCLING IS LATEST

Riders on Novel Merry-Go-Round Pedal to Turn Propellers Which Supply Needed Motive Power.

A novel form of merry-go-round has been devised by an Illinois man. A contest must win a seven arm swivel be mounted on the top. Suspended from the ends of this arm, on long rods, are bicycle frames, with all the characteristics of a bicycle, except the wheels. In place of wheels a propeller is mounted behind the seat and it is this propeller that is directed by driving the pedals. To use this apparatus two children take seats on the frames and pedal as if they were riding a bicycle. This sets the propellers in motion and the merry-go-round revolves, the swivel mechanism imparting a rocking movement in addition. This amusement is practically aerial cycling, and the speed of the revolutions is limited only by the speed with which the riders can pedal.

INTERESTING STORY BY GIRL

Says That Children May Assist Parents by Giving Them Benefit of Education Received.

A very interesting story appeared in Sunday's Agent recently, written by a little girl eleven years old, who is her father's right hand man when it comes to keeping books. Mr. Vaughn of the Colorado Agricultural college visits schools in this state and his plans are expected to keep records, many will develop into home bookkeepers. This little girl, Miss Ruth Kent, says: "Bookkeeping is the most important thing in the world. Everybody has a business just the same as banking, hence it is just as necessary for a farmer to know how to keep his accounts as it is for any other man. Unless a farmer is successful in his line of business, why cannot the farmer keep up with the times? Farming is a business where if it justly behoves and run the farm with some system of bookkeeping, so he can know at the end of a day, or month, or year, that he is in or on a profitable basis; for the daughter, or daughters, keep the books for the home and family expenses, and the son or sons, keep the books for the farm. If we children can help our parents in this way, then we could give them the benefit of our education which they have paid for at sacrifice to give us. Your banker would be glad to help you get started in the small way, and would take an interest in you. I know you would like it."

LOP-SIDED LADS DEVELOPED

Intercollegiate Sports Now in Vogue Instead of Popular Proportioned Boys of Today.

"College athletics of today are physically lop-sided." For more than a decade their chest, shoulder and arm developments have been decreasing, while the attention bestowed upon the legs and feet has increased. So declares Dr. G. A. May, gymnasium director at the university of Michigan, who based his statements upon observations extending over a period of many years spent as a gym instructor and upon charts made a decade ago and this year.

Doctor May advocates that all freshmen be required to put in a year's athletic training in the gymnasium before being permitted to try out for varsity teams.

Cat and Rat.

Have you ever played this game? It is great fun. Get a large number of children to ring up in a broad ring. Select one person for a rat and one for a cat. The rat goes on the inside of the ring and the cat on the outside, and the cat tries to catch the rat. The rat can enter the ring to keep the cat out of the ring. If the cat does get in the rat must get out. When the rat is caught a new cat and rat must be chosen. This is a fine outdoor game.

Strange Questions Asked.

"What strange questions children sometimes ask!" remarked a well-dressed man. "Yesterday I was in a drug store, when a little girl came in. She had evidently been sent on an errand. Her mother was sick, I gathered from the conversation between the clerk and the little girl. The clerk was a young man, and he was very busy. The little girl was very polite, and waited patiently for the young man to finish what he was doing. At last he came to her and said, 'What can I do for you?' The little girl said, 'Please, sir, I want a dose of castor oil.' The young man was astonished, and he said, 'Castor oil? Why, what do you want castor oil for?' The little girl said, 'Please, sir, I want a dose of castor oil.' The young man was still more

ZEPPELIN RAIDS TEST OF MACHINE

New Dirigible Used In Recent Flights Over England.

OFFICERS FEAR MORE BOMBS

Motorcycle Said to Have Toured Path of Raider and Indicated Route With Brilliant Headlight—People Treat Bombs Lightly, but Officials Take Many Precautions.

LOWESTOFT, England.—A tour by motorcycle gave the pilot of the latest Zeppelin raider took across and around this section of England supports the opinion that he had no particular matters other in view. The big dirigible was seen and heard at Southwold soon after midnight and disappeared over the sea at Lowestoft about an hour later. It made an extended tour over a considerable area, dropping a large number of incendiary bombs and a few explosive bombs but neither inflicting half its time maneuvering to the neighborhood of Henham hall, a mansion of the nobility. It is possible the pilot mistook the hall for some other building which he supposed to be of military importance.

The dropping of the numerous incendiary bombs appears to have been done in an effort to set fire to barns or haystacks, which would illumine the landscape and enable the pilot to locate some landmark by which he could get his bearings.

Reports from Holland quote German naval officers as stating the Zeppelin used for this raid was a new one and the trip was in the nature of a test. German navigation is in an city to be counted after long experience. It is not is possible the visit to this section had little significance except as training for pilots and men.

The raider passed over Lowestoft two or three times, a calm night making maneuvering easy. A fire bomb which fell into a pile of timber did damage estimated at $25,000, and the two or three explosive bombs which followed targets did slight damage.

Elsewhere there was no damage of the passage of the invader except some holes in the ground, some broken windows, doors blown from their hinges and a jarring countrywide. The broken windows and damaged doors were regarded lightly by the inhabitants, and their feelings were rather of astonishment and surprise than fear or clamor. "I've lived in this house twenty-7 years, and nothing like this ever happened before," was a characteristic comment on the general attitude.

There are many stories of miraculous escapes, but most of them have little basis in actual fact. Countryside gossip is also busily engaged in rounding up mysterious spies, and fully half the people in the visited district believe the harkened story of a mysterious motorcyclist who piloted the raider by means of a headlight of peculiar brilliancy.

While the civilians are generally inclined to treat lightly the result of the Zeppelin activity, military men in charge of the various defense projects incline to a more serious view. They are greatly afraid of the crimes that the raids are in the nature of reconnaissance and will be followed by more determined attempts shortly. Zeppelins have now reached the English coast several times, and with good luck and favorable weather they may be expected to return eventually in larger numbers and with more serious intentions.

Allies' Air Man's Brilliant Escape.

Paris.—An aviator of the allies was fired on over Ghent, but by flying rapidly down the Meuse the Germans believe he had been killed, and they caused rejoicing throughout the region by displaying his portrait, dropped two bombs and escaped.

Paris Idolizes Aviators.

Paris.—Before the tomb of the late Jacques Goujon, seventeen, killed over German territory, blew up two enemy fleets with bombs he was required, escaped and carried to the French lines a German missile gun. He has been given a medal.

MOTHER OF BATTLE RIVERS.

Austria, Russia and Germany Traversed by the Majestic Vistula.

The Vistula river, one of the mightiest of European streams flowing toward the north, sweeps in an irregular course through three empires—Austria, Russia and Germany. It serves as a frontier line between Austria and Germany, between Austria and Russia, and for a short distance between Russia and Germany. Upon its banks lie the cities of Cracow, Warsaw, Modlin, Plock, Thorn, Kulm, Graudenz, Marienburg and the Baltic port of Dantzig.

The Vistula rises in Austrian Silesia and takes a serpentine course of 650 miles to the sea. Its source is on the northern slopes of the West Beskides, a spur range of the Carpathians. The upper reaches of the river run through a narrow, wooded valley, narrowing in places to a picturesque gorge with tree-lining sides, and throughout its highway is surrounded by a wild scenery as can be found in the United States.

Just before reaching Cracow the Vistula leaves the mountains, and from this Galician city onward it is navigable for smaller boats. Its direction from Cracow is away from its mouth, and it penetrates deeply into the plains of Russian Poland before it turns, not far from Warsaw, south to Gregory plain. It banks through the high Polish plateau in the south and in the neighborhood of Warsaw are high bluffs often sharp and faced with loosely held earth crumbs, and altogether difficult of passage between bank and bank. From Warsaw on it is navigable for large river craft.

The plain through which the river passes from Warsaw to Thorn, while the boundary line, falls into swelling lowlands, the river course becomes tricky and wandering, while the banks are far from ever sliding into the water. The Vistula enters Prussia ten miles above Thorn, the strong Prussian frontier fortress. Beyond this point it cuts through the Prussian ridge, enters low country again, where its shifting banks give considerable trouble to navigation.

Before reaching the North sea at Dantzig it divides into two arms, that on the west retaining the name Vistula. Thick sheet ice finds the river at Warsaw, as a general thing, about the Christmas time, and the list of March. It is visited by periodical floods, the most pronounced in spring and in midsummer. The Vistula forms one of the most important rivers in Russia, and in Russian Poland, in addition to its important Prussian traffic. It is connected by canals with the Dnieper, Niemen, and through it with the Oder. It has a drainage basin 71,000 square miles in area, and receives the rivers of recent war fame the San, the Bug, the Pilica, the Bzura and the Wkrza—as tributaries.—Kansas City Star.

Than Silence Fall.

Long and earnestly they had argued in the village inn about the way in which the world would be destroyed. For four weary hours they had set forth their theories.

Finally they had asked the opinion of all the listeners, when, among them all, had alone remained silent. Taking his pipe from his mouth for one brief moment, he answered:

"It will probably be talked to death."—London Telegraph.

Drawbridge and Moat.

The moat is not dry like so many of ancient fortresses, but filled to the brim. This is the only English castle where the historic right of raising the drawbridge has come down from the days of chivalry.

When the Dreamer Waked

By H. M. EGBERT

©Copyright, 1921, by W. G. Chapman.

"I'm glad you are going to marry Norma, Harry," said Norma's father to her fiance. "She is the kind and sweetest girl in the world, and I have always hoped that she would marry a good man. I think you are the best suited to Norma of any man I know."

And Harry MacIntyre had gone away from the crowded Islesville feeling as if he were treading on air.

He counted the months that lay between him and the goal of his desires, Norma, with her sweetness, her radiant goodness, her simplicity of heart was always in his thoughts. And Norma was not "temperamental."

Like many, perhaps most literary men, Harry was "temperamental." A rising writer already earning a comfortable income, Harry had created heroines innumerable, blonde and brunette, stately queens, beautiful queens, demure and dainty ones. Sometimes he had wished that he could turn some of these ideals into flesh and blood. But always the final heroine is a ferment of the brain, an airy nothing.

And Norma was not Harry's ideal. She was simply a sweet girl, admirably suited to him. Harry felt a refreshment of the spirit when, turning away from his lovers' creations, he encountered the blue eyes of Norma, sane, healthy and always bringing him back to his proper appreciation of life.

There was only one flaw in their happiness. May Arbuckle, Norma's best friend, was "temperamental," and she did not like Harry.

Harry was conscious of this unspoken hostility. He knew that if ever the dreadful day dawning when misunderstanding arose between him and his fiancee, he would have to reckon with the implacable hostility of Miss Arbuckle. He sensed that through all the frigid courtesy of their meetings.

Harry had gone into the country for a brief vacation. He felt that he was to leave Norma, but circumstances made that was all, but there was a world of meaning in the flutter of the little hand in his.

No, that was not quite all, for, at the very end, as he leaned from the buggy:

"Au revoir, Mr. MacIntyre."

Then Harry was gone to spend three miserable days at another hotel, a little place miles distant, where his days and nights were haunted by visions of Miriam.

And at the end he came to the conclusion that he must offer Norma her freedom.

And yet the thought of her grief maddened him with remorse. He did not know what to do.

In this undecided frame of mind he approached the house where she lived. He had gone there in the evening, it was dark except for a single light that shone in the parlor. As he approached the door he was arrested by hearing the sound of voices. Norma and May Arbuckle were talking.

"You say you never loved Willis, and yet you think of him," said May. "Norma dear, consider your heart's promptings before it is too late."

"I have considered them, May," answered Norma. "And they tell me that I have not erred in my choice.

"But at least Willis was more of your ideal than Harry," suggested May.

"In a way—yes, May. Willis was my ideal friend, you see. We shared all our tastes in common. And Harry is comparatively a stranger. We do not know each other yet."

"Norma, dear," said May Arbuckle, "do you know the fate of a woman who marries a man like that? At least, even if their marriage is to be a happy one, she must be the slave to his moods."

"I have thought of that," said Norma miserably.

"When it started, had Norma thought of that? Why, that had been in his own mind from the beginning, but he had never confessed it even to himself, using the ability to analyze these obscure functions of psychic conflict. He did not know Norma had seen what he had seen.

"You are running a grave danger, Norma," continued May Arbuckle. "Don'tyou know the fate of a woman who marries a man like that? At least, even if their marriage is to be a happy one, she must be the slave to his moods."

"I have thought of that," said Norma miserably.

Ferreting Out An Injustice

It Was All Done by a Young Lawyer For an Attractive Widow.

By WILLARD BLAKEMAN

There has been the same development in jurisprudence as in everything else. From the time of trial by battle to trial by jury there has been continued progress, and, strange to say, there are more reforms being considered today than ever before. In other words, confidence in the justice dispensed in our criminal courts is dying out.

The reason of this is that legal justice is mechanical, and mechanical contrivances do not always work. The many ingenious hypotheses that have been engaged up by detective story writers have sometimes helped to name people chary of believing in the infallibility of courts. I, as a criminal lawyer, have often, by thought and energy alone, turned the results of a month's trial into an absurdity. In the first place I judge of an accused person's innocence from intuition. After that I think and work—principally the latter.

I was in a criminal courtroom one day when a young woman was convicted of having sent a dose of chloral to her husband. I watched her countenance and made up my mind from its emotional expression that she was innocent. You may sneer at judgment from emotional expression, but it is often the basis of my efforts in my profession. If you ask me how I can tell innocence from guilt by such a process I am forced to admit that I cannot tell innocence.

The case I have referred to is this: Fifth Avenue married, through the influence of her mother, Mrstin Haywood, an elderly man, who was wealthy. It was a May and December match, and December soon froze the sap of May. The couple lived unhappily together. Haywood was a chronic invalid, and this with age made him peevish. He was very parsimonious and would not have a doctor, constantly experimenting with remedies which he procured himself.

The usual way for a young wife to get rid of an old husband is by poison. And the favorite poison is arsenic. The arsenic is always discovered in the deceased's stomach, but this does not seem to deter candidates for widowhood from using it.

Old Haywood died under very suspicious circumstances. These were that he was ill for some time and no doctor was in attendance. No druggist in the town where he lived and died had sold him any medicines. How could a man die without a doctor or even a druggist to help him? The idea was a preposterous. It was the conclusion we arrived at. Mrs. Haywood's friends, however, insisted that the deceased had procured these incompatibles and their coagulum himself, and, as another accordingly. The rumors came to the knowledge of the police, who examined the body; a chemist made an analysis and found arsenic.

This was sufficient evidence in Hestor to convict his wife of having poisoned him. But the courts, which are instituted to give all accused persons the benefit of the doubt, which are based on the same machinery for the innocent and the guilty, insist upon putting man through the legal mill. A prisoner brought up in refinement and morality is ground out through the same mill as a Black Hand murderer who, by a signal, intimates a witness that if he tells the truth his life will pay the forfeit.

Mrs. Haywood was brought to trial, and, as I have said, I was in the courtroom when she was sentenced. She had been convicted by the law machine, twice good and true men taking its spokesman, and was sentenced to life imprisonment. I knew that she was innocent. How? I have told you that I cannot tell you this. Scoffers have since said that I mistook sympathy for intuition. Let them scoff.

I will admit that I went away from the courtroom with a heavy heart and that the agony of despair in that beautiful face haunted me. It compelled to haunt me. When at the end of several months I found I could not get rid of it I determined that I must prove the innocence of the subject of it or continue to suffer indefinitely. I determined to begin a work for which I would receive no pecuniary compensation.

Having procured a copy of the evidence in Mrs. Haywood's case, after studying it I made up my mind, notwithstanding the fact that Haywood had bought no drugs during his illness, that he had taken more arsenic than was good for him. Whether it had produced his death or not did not matter. His widow had been convicted of killing him by giving him poison on the ground that he had not bought it himself and she had bought it. This was evidence enough for the court, but it was not enough for me.

I was tempted to go to the prison where Mrs. Haywood was confined and seek for points from her. But that is not in accordance with my methods. I preferred to work as a scientist, and a scientist should investigate independently of any influence. My theory being that Haywood had taken the drug himself, it behoved me to exhaust it before finding another.

Haywood had lived many years in the same town and the same house in which he died. I have said that he had never employed a physician. Never, then, to attire, since I inquiring at every doctor in town if he had ever prescribed arsenic as a remedy for any ailment. No one of the professions remembered having even been called upon to treat him. I then ransacked the druggists in the same way. Not a druggist but could tell him a particular of medicine. But one of them had sold Mrs. Haywood a considerable amount of arsenic with which to exterminate rats. At least this was the reason given for buying it. This drug, again, evidence had been given at the trial and had much to do with the conviction.

Now, if Haywood had been used to buying medicines in the town where he resided, there would be no proving that he had bought the arsenic which poisoned him would have been so easily identified. Mrs. Haywood's friends tender had stopped at this point, either not considering the fact that the deceased had bought no medicine in the town or silk, or if he had it probably did not occur to him that Haywood might have bought all his drugs some where else.

Persons who work for pay take such jobs as it will not harm to see and so hear. Whoever takes more than this does it for love. I suppose I never admit that love was my incentive. My energies were best upon proving that Haywood had bought the drug that killed him, and had not fallen in love with the woman who had been convicted of killing him I would not have entered upon the matter at all.

Haywood having been a stupendous drinker I did not believe that he would get on without inside lines. But, great as he had been, I did not go secretly to find the person who had sold them to him or to make the looking for a needle in a haystack. After modeling of all the druggists in town I took to a friend of the bottle business, a good and honest man, and said to him:

"I have reason to be that a possible reason for a man concealing the place where he bought his medicines was that he was taking some nerve drug and desired to conceal its habit. If this drug should not be a nerve drug it might be any other drug he wished to keep a secret. Haywood would naturally be very cold to the secret large city druggists, and I am sure that he was a man of a million people with a proportionate number of wholesale and retail druggists."

I went to the city myself, spending a week in it, and I found that Haywood had whether he had ever sent Hayward to any of them. I was about to give up the matter when it occurred to me that one who would take poison to commit suicide would not be likely to have the dose sent to his house. I did so. I went to the outside and asked every druggist I met if he had ever sent a dose of poison to any one in the place where Haywood had lived.

I found a number of druggists who had sent dose to very small quantities to A. H. Haywood, the second initial of the deceased. One of these druggists had sent the deceased on three times a tonic of arsenic. I was stunk with the fact that one of this tonic had been sent the person not very long before his death.

I went back and, of whether Mr. Haywood and Mr. Haywood were one and the same man I referred the matter at once and began an investigation. No such person as A. H. Haywood was or had been a citizen of the place.

In inquiry at the postoffice I finally found a person who had a letter addressed small parcels to Mr Ingersoll Haywood Mr Haywood Kansas.

I then went to the attorney who had defended Mr. Haywood and gave him an account of my investigations, proceeding on a theory that the deceased had a drug habit and had bought arsenic for a tonic. The attorney was a man of high and had honest ambition. He was a man of high and had honest ambition. He was a man of high and had honest ambition. He

—So—

Warrington, an American adventurer, and Jenkins, servant with a marquis's rank, the two known up and down the Riviera as Parrot & Co., are engaged by Hampton to cash a draft for $6,000 signed by Lord Dunmore, a notorious girl trimmer, with Warrington and take the money to Dunmore. He tells her that Warrington has taken a fancy to her and that Hampton, planning a scandal, wants Warrington out of the game. Through his tricks he has had her parents and herself thrown together on the river. Martha, Elsa's companion, warns Warrington against his tricks, pays his debts and overhears one interview in a row over cards. Both feel the trip is caused by an enemy. Jenkins is hurt by a fall from his motor car. He believes Elsa is attracted to Craig and slaps him with a hatpin. Warrington kiss Elsa goodby.

That there was real danger in her interest in Warrington did not occur to her. The fact that she was now willing to marry Arthur, without enjoying the causes that had brought her to this decision, should have warned her that she was dimly afraid of the strange fire. Her glance fell upon the mandarin ring. She twirled it round mechanically. Should she wear it or put it away? The question remained suspended. She saw Craig coming aboard and she hid her face behind her magazine. Upon second thought she set the magazine fall. She was quite confident that that chapter was closed. Craig might be a scoundrel but he was no fool.

A sharp blast from the tender's whistle drew her attention to the gangplank. The last man to come aboard was Warrington. He immediately sought James, and they stood together chatting until the tender drew up alongside the steamer of the Trifalbinia line. The two men shook hands finally, Warrington added a friendly tap on the Eurasian's shoulder. No one would have suspected that the white man and his dark companion had been "shipmates," in good times and in bad, for nearly a decade. Elsa, watching them from her secure nook, admired the lack of effusiveness. The dignity of the parting told her of the dignity of feeling.

An hour later they were heading for the delta.

Elsa amused herself by casting bits of bread to the gulls. Always they sought to on the wing, no matter in what direction she threw it. Some times one would wing up to her very hand for charity. The coral feet stretched out to meet the quick backglance of the bird. The coral feet were plaintive and world lonely.

Suddenly she became aware of a presence at her side.

A voice said: "It was not quite fair of you."

"What wasn't?" without turning her head. She broke her bacon rind into the crumbs.

"You should have let me know that you were going to sail on this boat."

"You would have run away, then."

"Why?" startled at her insight.

"Because you are a little afraid of me." She faced him, without a smile; either on her lips or in her eyes. Aren't you?"

"Yes. I am afraid of all things I do not quite understand.

"There is not the least need in the world, Mr. Warrington. I am quite harmless. My claws have been clipped. I am engaged to be married, and am going home to decide the day."

"He's a lucky man." He was astonished at his calm, for the blow went deep.

"Lucky? That is to the future. What a lonely thing a guilt is!"

"What a lonely thing a lonely man is!" he cried bitterly. "I have dreamed so fair a dream and it single moment! He tried to believe that he was glad that she had told him about the other man. The least this information could do would be to give him better control of himself. He had not been out in the open long enough entirely to master his feelings.

"Men ought not to be lonely," she said. "There's the excitement of work, of mingling with crowds, of doing when and where one pleases. Women's lot is wondering and waiting at home. When I marry I suppose that I shall learn the truth of that."

Perhaps it was because he had been away from them so long and had lost track of the moods of the feminine mind; but surely it could not be possible that there was real happiness in this young, [illegible] girl. Her dance was lacking in her voice, in her face in her gestures. He thought it over with a sigh. He felt sorry for the girl, sorry for the man for it was not possible that a girl like this one would go through life without experiencing that flash of beauty that is called the grand passion.

He loved her. He could lean against the rail, his shoulder lightly touching hers, and could say to himself that he loved her. He could calmly permit her to pass out of his life as a cloud passes down the sun-film. He hadn't enough, but his evil must be half him. Love! He spread out his hands unconsciously.

"What does that mean?" she asked, smiling now. "An invocation?"

"It's a sign to ward off evil," he retorted.

"Are you expecting evil?"

"I am always preparing myself to meet it. There is one thing that will always plague me. Why should you have asked the purser to pick out such a tramp as I was? I was a tramp."

"I thought I explained that."

"Not clearly."

"Well, then, I shall make myself clear. The sight of you upon that bank, the lights in your face, struck me as the strangest mystery that could possibly confront me. I thought you were a ghost."

"A ghost?"

"Yes. So I asked the purser to introduce you to prove to my satisfaction that you weren't a ghost. Lines for line, height for height, color for color, you are the exact counterpart of the man I was going home to marry."

She saw the shiver that ran over him; she saw his eyes widen; she saw his hands knot to pressure over the rail.

"The man you are going to marry!" he whispered.

Abruptly, without explanation, he walked away, his shoulders settled, his head bent. It was her turn to be amazed. What could this attitude mean?

"Mr. Warrington!" she called.

But he disappeared down the companionway.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Woman's Reason.

Elsa stared at the vacant doorway. She recognized only a sense of bewilderment. This was not one of those childish flashes of rudeness that had amused, annoyed and mystified her. She had hurt him. And how? The man had been happy for three days on the boat, and once he had taken tea with her in Hangcow. She could find nothing save that she had been kind to him when he most needed kindness, and that she had not been stupidly curious and sympathetically so. He interested her and held her interest because he was a type unlike anything she had met outside the covers of a book. He was so big and strong, and yet so boyish. He had given her visions of the character which had carried his manhood through all these years of strife and bitterness and temptation. And because of this she had shown him that she had taken for granted that whatever he had done in the past had not put him beyond the pale of her friendship. There had been no degrading entanglements, and women forgive or condone all other trait greenness.

And she had she just said or done to put that look of dumb agony in his face? She swung impatiently from the rail and began to promenade the deck, still clattered with luggage over which the Lascar stewards were moving. Many a glance followed the supple pleasing figure of the girl as she passed round and round the deck. Craig had wished it rather than he believed. And then, to meet him face to face in that sordid boarding house had shaken the cool nerve of the gambler. He was worried and bewildered. He had practically sent this man to ruin. What would be the reprisal? He remembered for a moment and at the white pulpy contents, but without the customary relish. The phrase kept running through his head: What would be the reprisal? For man of his tilt never struck without expecting to be struck back. Something must be done. Should he seek him and boldly ask what he intended to do? Certainly he could not do much on board here, except to denounce him to the officers as a professional gambler. And Paul would scarcely do that since he, Craig, had a better shot in his gun. He could tell who Paul was and what he had done. Bodily harm was what he really feared.

He had seen Elsa, but he had worked out that problem easily. She was sure to say nothing so long as he let her be; and with the episode of the happy still fresh in his memory, he was sure he would keep his distance. He had made a mistake, and was not likely to repeat it.

But Paul! He finished his dessert and went off to the study little smoke room, and struggled with a Burma cheroot. Paul was a smoker, and sooner or later he would drop in. He waited in vain for his man that night.

And so did Elsa. She felt indignant at one moment and hurt at another. The man's attitude was inexplicable; there was neither rhyme nor reason in it. The very fact that she could not understand made her wonder much beside her even in her dreams that night. She began to feel genuinely sorry that he had appeared above her horizon. Just before she retired she leaned over the rail, watching the reflection of the stars twist and silver on the smooth water. Suddenly she listened. She might have imagined it, for as night the eave deceive. "Jah-lah!" Somewhere from below came the muffled plaint of the fish.

Next day, at luncheon, the chair was still vacant. Elsa became alarmed. Perhaps he was ill. She made inquiries, regardless of the possible misinterpretation her concern might be given by others. Mr. Warrington had had his meals served in his cabin, but the steward declared that the gentleman was not ill, only tired and irritable, and that he amused himself with a trained parrot.

All day long the sea lay waveless and outspread, a sea of brass and lapis-lazuli; brass where the sun struck and lapis-lazuli in the shadow of the lazy swells. Schools of flying-fish broke fan-wise in flashes of silver, and porpoise sported alongside. And warmer and warmer grew the air.

Afterdeck was rigged up for cricket, and the ship's officers and some of the passengers played the game until the first gong. Elsa proceeded to Martha. There was little enough space to wait in as it was without the men taking over the whole side of the ship and chasing her out of a glorious sunset. Martha grew troubled and perplexed if there was one phase of character she could not be to Elsa it was irritability; and here she was, finding fault like any ordinary tourist.

Elsa Stared at the Vacant Doorway.

DANGEROUS GAME WITH BULL

Popular Pastime That Marks the Celebration of Feast Days in South America.

In the interior of Venezuela and Colombia tore coleado is a feature of fiesta days. A principal street of the town is roped off and a wild bull is released. From eight to ten mounted horsemen enter the improvised arena, their only defense against attacks of the bull being their superb horsemanship and a knowledge of how to twist the bull's tail in such a manner as to cause him to tumble over. While the attention of the bull is attracted by some of the party a horseman dashes from the rear at full speed, gives a dextrous twist, and over roll the bull. This sport is not without its danger, and almost every coleado festival ends in the hospital list. The honor of being a champion bull tail twister develops keen competition, for the winner is crowned with flowers by the prettiest girl in the village. Some performers become so expert as to be sure of their twist at a specified point, the great achievement being to bring the animal to the dust just in front of the balcony of one's ladylove.

New Enemy of Prairie Dog.

In South Dakota the alfalfa mice have found a great success as a prairie dog exterminator. A piece of hose slipped onto the exhaust conducts the gases into the dog hole for a few minutes, when the hole is covered with earth. That is enough for the dog.

LITTLE AFFECTED BY WAR

London's Whitechapel Pursues the More or Less Even Tenor of Its Way.

The wave of war has swept over Whitechapel, but it has not changed it very little, says Herman Shaffner. Among the shops the signs and symbols are there—the garish posters, the brunette boxes of Israel and the darkened streets that make London's Ghetto still more Ghetto-like.

Whitechapel is not only in the East but of the East. Elsa Lanchester "watched the legions thunder by, then plunged in thought again." Her eyes turned into the shadows, her interest in the drama of fresh air. There doesn't seem to be any on Gold Coast.

Martha followed her young mistress into the dining-saloon; she was anxious and upset. Where would this lead? Was it only a piece of relief to round Warrington's chair still vacant.

The saloon had an air of freshness tonight. All the men were in drill or pongee, and so recently had the population that the picture rubbed the room of half its best. To and fro the punka flapped; the pulleys creaked and the ropes scraped above the sound of knives and forks and spoons.

Elsa ate little besides fruit. She spoke scarcely a word to Martha, and soon to those around her. Thus, she missed the frown of the colonel and the lifted brows of the admirers, and the curious glances of the tourists. The passenger list had not come from the daily press, so Elsa's name was practically unknown. But in some unaccountable manner it had become known that she had been making inquiries in regard to the gentleman in cabin 78, who had thus far remained away from the table. Bits of idle gossip, idle and sensational, is about the only thing that makes it possible to live through the day. It was quite easy to couple this unknown aloof young woman and the invalid man, and then to wait for results. It would have amused Elsa had she known the interest she had already created if not inspired. Her beauty and her apparent indifference to her surroundings were particularly adapted to the romantic mood of her fellow-travelers. Her own mind was so broad and generous, so high and detached, that she would a thing as "an affair" never entered her thoughts.

As she refused course after course, a single phrase drummed incessantly through her tired brain. She was not going to marry Arthur; never, never in this world. She did not love him, and this was to be final. She would cable him from Singapore.

Startled was Elsa when she looked up to find in the cabin below; so he ordered his steward to bring up his dinning table. Elsa grew bored for half an hour, grown restless, and had begun to walk the deck in his bath slippers. He had noted the still white figure forward where the lonely maiden sat in the twilight. As he approached, Craig discovered the reason. It was the lonely girl who had been the touched Warrington's arm.

Afternoon Toilette in "Midnight" Blue

Here is an afternoon toilette in which the graceful gown is made of "midnight" blue taffeta and is worn with a necklace of ostrich feathers and crepe. The hat of blue straw is trimmed with velvet ribbon and has full-blown garden roses and their drop green foliage. Every detail of this costume is up to date and tastefully, therefore, worth consideration.

The gown shows a skirt having six slashes pleats joined to a yoke, or easy adjustment to the figure. It is not as short as skirts for tailored gowns, but sufficiently short to be full and graceful. The pleated portion of the skirt is set on to the yoke with a piping of the silk, and the bottom of the skirt is finished with a narrow binding.

The bodice is draped, giving the effect of a sleeveless coatee. All edges and seams are finished with piping, and there is a widely flaring collar with wings wired to hold its curving outlines. This, and the remarkably attractive sleeves, bestow much of its distinction upon this refined and beautiful design. In truth collars and cuffs appear to be the arbiters of fate for those gowns that aspire to originality this season.

The sleeves are long, with flaring cuffs extending over the hand. Their decoration with small buttons and embroidered in rococo motifs (more elaborated) could not be improved upon.

A separate collar and guimpe of fine batiste with narrow silk binding is in line with the season's vogue, but is equally especially for the chic gown with which it appears.

The laced boots with light cloth tops, and the smart millinery, provide a costume selected by an expert whose taste was reliable. All are the last words in matters of fashion, but the finished toilette is, nevertheless, quiet and refined.

Varied Waist Lines.

There is a waist line to suit every type—the empire for the slight youth, full figure, the natural waist line for the conservatives and straight ones for the stout figure.

Midsummer Millinery Allurements

Two beautiful dress hats emphasize the fact that hats large or small or medium between may be chosen by milady when she centers her attention upon her summer millinery. The matter of size need only be considered in connection with that of becomingness. The little hat still holds its own in a glorious company of newly arrived picturesque wide brimmed allurements that pleasingly distract the attention and divide the honors.

Without doubt the trend is toward the large hat for midsummer. And if a vote might be taken and recorded as to which is the most beautiful of the large hats for midsummer, the picture hat would be conceded to be the favorite of womankind and mankind, too.

A masterpiece in the art of millinery is pictured here in the lovely wide-brimmed hat of black lace and velvet. The crown is a mass of black wheat and big hop blossoms. The silky lace is so arranged that it shapes up like the aliret of aigrettes. Their arrangement is unusual and the effect beautiful.

Glimpses of wide black velvet ribbon add a final touch of richness to a superb composition.

In the shadow of this splendor the small brilliant turban loses nothing of its charm. To the little hat belongs all sorts of eccentric curves and turns and points, and its business is not to be dignified.

The model shown is of silk straw in putty color. At the front, pieces of the straw braid are edged with an embroidered band and draped over the frame. Grapes and leaves, simulated in silk by brilliant colors, are posed flat against the hat, and an occasional tendril reaches out from the corners. This very clever little model is finished with a long slender feather which soars from the left side with great graciousness of purpose to add height to the hat. It changes its mind and curls downward again, taking advantage of the privilege of the little hat to be coquettish.

JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

Afternoon Frocks.

Afternoon dresses, whether in taffeta or cloth, will be worn with a natural sort of coat or cloak. Pale taffeta in black, blue and white is being used for afternoon frocks made with box plaits and panels. Some swathed bodice with long sleeves and a skirt with a little sleeveless bolero. Lace is used a great deal. Some of the skirts dip at the sides, and one of them are longer in front than behind. The tunic is cut, so through there still are tunic effects.

The Young Wife.

"My wife got her recipes mixed and all her hard work went for nothing."

"How was that?"

"She tried to make chocolate fudge out of a formula for cleaning brass work."

PEORIA WOMAN TELLS EXPERIENCE

Mrs. W. L. McClellan, of Peoria, suffered torture from indigestion, gas, belching and other symptoms of stomach trouble. She spent large sums of money for doctors' advice and medicine. Still her condition did not improve. She found relief, wonderful, surprising relief in a drug store window. This is her story, as she tells it:

"I suffered so from distention and colicky pains that at times I was completely incapacitated for my household work. I saw a window display of Mayr's Wonderful Remedy and decided to purchase a bottle, which I did. I have taken only one bottle and the results have been really wonderful. I have not had a pain in my stomach since, and let me say that for the first time in many, many months, two days following I have had a natural movement of the bowels. I feel I cannot say enough for the remarkable virtues of your remedy."

Mayr's Wonderful Remedy gives permanent results for stomach, liver and intestinal ailments. Eat as much and whatever you like. No more distress after eating, pressure of gas in the stomach and around the heart. MUST HAVE SHOCKED JUDGE

What He Regarded as "Dribblings" of Hay Was All He was Going to Get.

A distinguished member of the United States judiciary lately discovered that he still has something to learn in the art of husbandry.

He bought a farm as a summer home for his family, and finds special delight in walking about the place, commenting on the condition of the crops and in asking questions of the interest in his new possessions.

One evening during the summer he was strolling over the farm. The hired man had cut the grass during the day—a very modern thing—and left it on the ground to dry. The judge saw it, and called his man he said:

"It seems to me you are very careless. Way haven't you been more particular in raking up this hay? Don't you see that you have left little dribblings all around?"

For a minute the hired man stared, wondering if this judge was quizzing him. Then he replied:

"Little dribblings? Why, man, that's the crop!"

Vague Assertions.

"When will the war be over?" inquired the inquisitive citizen.

"I don't suppose there's any way of telling," replied the querulous pulpeer. "When the fiercest kind of fighting was going on they said Oil was the vital material. Maybe the war is over now, only they don't know it."

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

John Henry on Turkey Trotting

(Copyright, 1913, by The New York Newspaper Syndicate.)

SAY! did you ever get ready and go to a Turkey Trot party?

Bold me—I deserve it, Paw!

You wouldn't think it, but here in New York the Pet of Fortune who makes it his life's work to Hurn Money is continuous hard put for an excuse to Light the Match.

When a Pulaski with nothing in his attic but shredded wheat falls heir to a barful of Maxima he quickly realizes that the money has to be lignited—but how to do it?

The average that hangs between his pompadour and his eyebrows becomes Care-furrowed from trying to figure out just how to set fire to the coin Dad left him without attracting the attention of the police.

The Poor Thing soon discovers that it's awfully hard to invest in new style in Financial Bonfires, so he falls back on the flint-and-steel method of ignition—and Gives a Party.

He knows that his bundle of green and yellow pastilloes will burn with a brighter flame if he can induce a lot of Night Hawks to carry by his hearthstone during the ceremony.

And joy in abundance is his when they begin to Kick the ashes around his $1,000 apartment with their slipped-hip and in-toes.

Having heard Peaches breathe a desire to be among Those Present at a Turkey Toddle, our friend Hep Hardy got busy with his favorite paying teller and gave one.

I tried to explain to friend wife that she'd better let the man be said:

"It seems to me you are very careless. Way haven't you been more particular in making up this hay? Don't you see that you have left little dribblings all around?"

For a minute the hired man stared, wondering if this judge was quizzing him. Then he replied:

Vague Assertions.

"When will the war be over?" inquired the inquisitive citizen.

"I don't suppose there's any way of telling," replied the querulous pulpeer. "When the fiercest kind of fighting was going on they said Oil was the vital material. Maybe the war is over now, only they don't know it."

Meantime the War Dance of the Manhattan Indians Went Bravely On.

the Imperial German Army, for he still wears his Uhlan uniform with Hand-painted sleeves and the Murillo panels inserted in the silk stockings.

Some class, tats it from Uncle Jasper!

There is such an air of subdued elegance and concentrated luxury about the lay-out that you want to talk in a telephone, call up your office and tell them there that you're never going to work again as long as you live.

The elevator doors swing open disclosing a phone pad card of a Turkish scraglio—whatever that is. Then a West Indian clerk, all dolled like Sir Walter Raleigh on his way to see Queen Elizabeth, gives you the high sign and shoots Heavenward while you sink to your waist in the Persian rug in the floor of the gilded cage.

Hep's parade grounds are on the Twelfth floor. His apartment consists of eleven rooms and nine baths. Through an overshaft the dining room and the butler's pantry have no bath attached, but Hep says that defect will be remedied if he has to drop another $1,000 a year into the Kitty.

The Party was in full blast when we reached the scene of the Conflagration.

A string orchestra concealed behind a lot of aspidistras, rubber plants and forced enough ragtime for everybody to dig in and help themselves, so up and down through Hep's library into the drawing-room, through the living-room, across the hall, and through the card room, around the foyer, back through the sitting room, down the hall again and back into the drawing-room the various couples pranced and galloped and swigged and squirmed and hugged each other into the belief that this was Life.

Hep met us at the door of the Fun Factory and introduced us to all the celebrities present, with the exception of those who were busy stepping on each other's feet in the Jersey speed.

Peaches and I sat down to watch the fun and revels, but as we did so a shoe box concealed in our little tête-a-tête sofa began to play "Smoker Oskums," so we arose hurriedly and decided to stand during the rest of the carnival.

When we hurried across to the station a Literary Coal whose name is Georgie Nathan got the drop on us.

"Pardon me!" he said giggling, "but to a man with my keen sense of humor the episode of the concealed music was intensely ludicrous. Now that my laughter has subsided would you mind doing it over again that I may study the situation from a psychological point of view?"

"What are you going to do with a tired sinner like that?

I wanted to coax him into one of the rest rooms and turn the slow-off on him, but Peaches begged me not to damper his youthful ardor, so I told him what particular ingredient of a cheese sandwich he resembled and passed him up.

Georgie is fearfully erudite. With his thumb and forefinger he picks his words out of his bulging forehead and assembles them into real little parts. These he carries on a tray to a magazine where said hearted men pay his money and he lows to use some back until he has spent it all.

Georgie was getting along very nicely until one day somebody told him he was clever—then he fell apart.

Now he makes up his pieces in front of a mirror and when he thinks of something devilishly cute he and his reflection exchange loving glances. Then he pins a medal on his breast and quits work for the day.

Somebody should take off Georgie's watch and slap his wrist real hard.

In the meantime the war dance of the Manhattan Indians went bravely on. It was catches-catch-can all over the place.

Men swayed and toddled and wobbled and hobbled, each and all of that sheep herd trying to show off that they were human beings.

They danced the Lame Duck and Stumpers, Cinnamon Bear, the Lingering Drag and the Jack Rabbit Jump; the Boston, Boston and the Philadelphia Scramble. Every once in a while they'd stop, take a long breath and then off again into the Buzzard Hand and Walrus Wiggle.

Each individual tried to act as a special agent for the Zoo?

"How do you like it?" I asked Peaches.

"It's awful," she gasped. "Look at that girl over there. Why does she try to act like a peekaboo?"

"Come out of the hardware store," to inquire if we were having a good time.

"Great!" I announced; "but, say, Hep! you've been getting some new scenery, haven't you? What's that over in the corner there, with the bright lights around it—A Venus de Milo with her arms fractured?"

"Let go!" Hep snickered. "That's Charlot Swift of the Private Theater."

"Oh!" I said; "what's the matter—did the dressmaker disappoint her?"

"Why, no," Hep assured me; "she's wearing the latest in French creations—the cobweb gown."

"Well, why not put the poor girl a screen, she'll catch cold," I suggested just as Lord Rumbo of Merry England bawled out to know if we were on, whereupon Hep whispered something to me about being kind to the nobility and moseyed away.

"Hipping, isn't it?" said His Lordship.

"Which one?" I queried; "that makes seven I've danced in half an hour."

"What are you referring to, I mean to say?" miscued the son of a belted Earl.

"The skirts," I answered; "they've been flipping ever since the music started. Some of these zinks do the Turkey trot like a nervous man going up an apple tree for a midday meal."

"Quite so," pleadlited the last of the aristocrats; "I'm a nervous man on the affair—the party! Hipping! I didn't think I was going to like America, I mean to say, but these Turkey Trot parties have quite won me over—quite. I attend them constantly. I was broken-hearted when they closed the cabarets at one o'clock. Disgustin, really! What life without the turkey trot—nothing! What is one's existence without the tango—nothing, I mean to say. Take away my Bunny Hug and what have I left—nothing! Separate me from my Boston Dip and life becomes a drear expanse. What's the use of going to restaurants any longer? You can't dot one's soup without turkey trot music. I've tried it—and it splashes."

You know when the bug bites as deep as that it does no good to yell for peroxide.

I say, old chap," His Lordship rattled along, "where's your charming wife? I would like awfully to do the New Orleans Drag with her—what?"

"She doesn't dance," I said. "One foot is a Presbyterian; the other a Methodist—nothing doing."

"I think she does splendidly," the Transit from the House of Lords came back at me. "Ah, there she is now with my friend, Hardy; doing the Cincinnati thing, aren't they?"

I looked and suffering ragtime! his blue-blooded Niles was right. There was Peaches with Hep Hardy hooting it down the room and making the ocean a jubilee of joy.

Gasping, I fell back on the trick sofa and let "Smoky Oskums" play to the bitter end.

"Bind up his wounds, Pawter; with proper nursing we may pull him through.

Wrong Conception.

It is indeed amusing the wrong conception of women's activity. The guidance of principal cities in this country is in the hands of men. The other day a rich Standard arrived at a New York hotel from Tarrytown. After duly reading the menu he called for an relatives making a dinner engagement by p. m. at the hotel. Then he commenced. The answer seemed three hours but he did not appeared. They went home greatly alarmed and reappeared early next day and realized at the hotel all day, every few minutes making anxious inquiries for the missing Standard. About five o'clock in the afternoon, just as the women were about ready to notify the police, their relative strode in, covered with dust. With cries of joy they ran toward him, and it said where he had been. "Why," he said, "I got into a car and told the chauffeur to drive me to Boston, which, I thought, was only a suburb of New York. But after three hours' ride I found out differently and said a telegram to you at the hotel." Of course, the women never got it because they were not registered. Undaunted, the dan, pained beyond expression, began to buy wine for them all in an effort to square Matters.

War-Time Boom in Rags.

A boom in rags is the latest effect of war upon industry. They are wanted for the textile trade, and, as continental supplies have fallen off, the demand has caused higher rag prices. At Dewsbury, Eng., and other textile centers the rag sales have been marked by exciting scenes. Prices have advanced by $10 a ton, and by $35 and $40 for the better sorts.

His Outlook.

"Life seems all upside down!" moaned the baby, when they revealed to him that he had swallowed a button.

"At any rate, you're well heeled," responded the parents, each of whom held one.

Little Pitchers.

"Grandma, are you with the circus?"

"Of—course not, child. What makes you ask such a thing?"

"I heard pa say that when you came to visit us, we'd have an elephant on our hands.

'CATCH' NOT SUCH A BAD ONE

Some Method in "Madness" of Nice-Looking Old Man Pictured by Representative Hartholdt.

Representative Hartholdt said at a German-American banquet in Milwaukee:

"Those people remind me of the old man. Yes, they remind me very much of the old man.

"He had a soft, daft look—the old man I'm speaking of—and he sat on a park bench in the sun with rod and line, as if he were fishing, but the line, with a worm on the hook, dangled over a bed of bright primroses.

"'Hah!' said a passer-by to himself. Daft. Hughouse. Nice-looking old fellow, too. It's a pity.

"Then, with a gentle smile, the passer-by approached the old man and said:

"'What are you doing, uncle?'

"'Fishing, sir,' answered the old man, solemnly.

"'Fishing, eh? Well, uncle, come and tell us a fish story.'

"The old man shouldered his rod and followed the kindly stranger to the corner saloon. There he regaled himself with a large glass of dark beer and a good five-cent cigar. His host, contemplating him in a friendly, protecting way, as he sipped and smoked, said:

"'So you were fishing, uncle! And how many have you caught this morning?'

"The old man blew a smoke cloud toward the ceiling. Then, after a pause, he said:

"'You are the seventh, sir.'"

The Old Excuse.

"You could be happy if you knew how, your child, then to pitch into a tipsy man. Now you've fixed your husband and he's some off."

"But I didn't know he was loaded."

PROMINENT MEN ON THE LUSITANIA

Vanderbilt and Others on Torpedoed Ship's List.

WERE WARNED NOT TO SAIL

Passengers Were Inclined to Disregard Official German Notice, Relying on Vessel's Speed to Save Them—Some Canceled His Passage, but All Were Anxious as They Left New York.

Among the numerous prominent passengers on the Lusitania, which was torpedoed by a German submarine off the Irish coast, was Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt, New York city. Just before sailing on May 1 Mr. Vanderbilt received a twinge of warning saying:

"I received a letter from a friend in Vienna that I ought to be torpedoed. You had better send a telegram to Berlin."

The telegram did not frighten Mr. Vanderbilt, who departed to look after his estate in England and remained three months, returning to the summer home of John Mrs. Vanderbilt and his children at Oakland Farm, near Newport, and took after his new hotel in Newport. All reports said Mr. Vanderbilt was safe.

Prominent Names on Passenger List.

Many of the other names on the passenger list of the Lusitania have often been seen on the manifests of transatlantic ferry boats. Among them were Elbert Hubbard, the famous writer-philosopher; Sir Hugh Lane, director of the National Gallery; Charles A. Frohman, the famous theatrical manager; Prof. Alexander Ananoff, the famous Russian author; Prof. Leo Frobenius, the famous German explorer; Frederick D. Padilla, Mexican consul-general at Liverpool; Major and Mrs. P. Warren Pearl and their three children, William J. Pierman, Miss Theodate Pope, George A. Powell, Mrs. G. Sterling Ivins, and Miss Laura Ivins, Mrs. G. W. Stephens, Lady Allan and the Misses Anna and Gwen Allan, Justin de Aryle, Cuban consul-general in Liverpool; Lindon Bates, Jr., Charles H. Bowring, Conway S. Cram, Neil Johnston, Mrs. Campbell-Johnston and Mr. and Mrs. Paul Crompton and family. Some of these are also:

Mme. Marie de Page, wife of Dr. Antoine de Page, surgeon to King Albert, who is in charge of the outlying work of the Belgian Red Cross, sailed for home on the Lusitania. She collected in America $100,000 and Belgium of supplies.

Warning Did Not Scare Them.

The warning of the German embassy to travelers, published on the society page of the newspapers, that a state of war exists between Germany and her allies and Great Britain and her allies and that those sailing under the British flag or allied flags do so at their risk and that some of the belligerents effect on the passengers sailing away on the Lusitania.

The American appeared to treat the German warning and the announcement warnings as a joke. Elbert Hubbard, who, with Mrs. Hubbard, was booked for France, admitted that the kaiser's warning might be directed against both the Lusitania and himself as the "friend of literature" as he has referred to himself in his journal.

"To be torpedoed would be a glorious way to peter out," he said. "But it would be a poor advertisement."

Warned on Steamship's Pier.

Many of the first class cabin passengers—there being a big gathering of the latter—on reaching the pier were accosted by strangers, one of whom spoke English with a German accent, who warned them to remain ashore. Edward Mallon, chief of the mounted detective force, drove them back.

While there were no cancellations, many of the voyagers, most of them British, lined up at the rail with white and anxious faces trying to make out their feats and cheer their tearful friends ashore. They laughed at German submarine, if not a German "ship-of-war" cruiser, was waiting to warn them.

Unusual precautions were taken to guard the ship and her passengers. Friends detectives were on hand to see that no explosives were sent aboard and to ward off suspicious looking strangers. Only those who were identified by passengers were permitted to go aboard.

1294 PASSENGERS, 850 IN CREW, 2,440 IN LIFEBOATS AND RAFTS FOR 2,835.

There were 1,294 persons on board the Lusitania, ship she was torpedoed, divided as follows:

First cabin 290
Second cabin 200
Third cabin 1,000
Total number of passengers 1,294
Total number in crew 850
The Lusitania carried on the way of life-saving appliances, namely:
Lifeboats, capacity 41 to 65 persons each 22
Lifeboats, collapsible, capacity 40 persons each 2
Life rafts, capacity 16 persons each 12
Life rafts, collapsible, capacity 4 persons each 2
Total capacity of lifeboats and life rafts estimated by officials of line at 2,440 persons.
Best figures give minimum capacity of 2,835 persons.
In addition there was a life preserver for each person.

A CURIOUS ORDEAL

Plight of a Man Who Almost Felt Death Touch Him.

IN A VAT OF BOILING WATER.

His Vivid Story of His Sensations as He Tumbled Helpless on His Back on a Bale of Raw Silk in the Seething Liquid and His Terror Thereon.

A man who is now at the head of one of the largest establishments for dyeing silks in this country tells a story of a strange and thrilling adventure that he passed through when he was still only the superintendent of the "boiling room."

"Silk," he says in telling the story, "has been the means of my living and once it saved my life. Have you ever been in a room where they boil the raw silk? It's a hot, steaming place, with great bubbling vats that rise and sink to level with the floor. The raw silk, in bales, all fluffy and sticky—comes in on rolling trucks and is dumped into the vats. Treatment in the boiling liquid is good deal before it gets soaked through and goes under.

"Just before the noon hour one day a truck came in with two bales on it.

"I jump then into No. 6 vat. I told the men, 'I'll stir them if you fellows want to go to dinner.'

"When they had gone I began to look around for the stirring fork. I couldn't find it anywhere. 'Confound Bill!' I said to myself. 'He loses everything.'

"I had barely got the words out of my mouth when my foot went off the edge of the vat. I felt myself falling and I was seized with the full conviction of death.

"I had time to think over just how horribly hot the boiling water would feel and to wonder how much of me would be left when the men came back from dinner. Then I felt myself fall on my back on the mass of floating silk.

"To this day I can see the very look of the old smoky roof as I lay on the blind ceiling with the boiling water all sides. It was horribly hot there. The sensation started out to roast me, and I felt that I must move.

"First, however, I shouted as loudly as I could. There no one answered. I cautiously tried to turn on my side. The bale of raw silk began slowly to roll over. Nearly paralyzed with terror, I threw out one arm. It was just enough change in balance. I felt the rolling motion stop. Then I knew it would go no more. I lay on my back upon the middle of the bale, and waited for help. After a minute or two I began to realize that the silk was slowly soaking into me.

"You could hardly notice the motion. At first I could look out of the corner of my eyes and see the edge of vat. No. 6. A little later, when I looked again, it was out of my line of vision. I couldn't move without having the bale roll over and I remained still I would go down inch by inch into the scalding water below.

"I was conscious that I became a little hysterical. It's funny what tricks the mind plays.

"This is dying with a 'Gangrene,' I said aloud, and I cried and laughed as I said it.

"It was growing better. Steam had begun to percolate through the silk, and I was wet through with the stifling heat from the boiling liquid below of the water. I had no idea of time. By and by, however, some one answered my shouts. The door opened and two men came running across the room.

"'Get a rope!' shouted one.

"I knew that would be fatal; the slightest push and I would roll over into the steaming stew.

"'Boys,' cried I. 'Don't touch me or I will be all over.' One of you turn off the feed pipe. Let the other man go down the ladder. The pipe that empties this vat is on the left. Turn it on—full. Do it quick!'

"I could hear the clang, clang of the steam being cut off from the vat. A moment later I felt the hot water that had broaded round the edges, and I knew the water was filling, at first but half an hour to empty No. 6. For confounded lazy, I was excited. Then they got a rope and sat on the edge of the vat watching me with quiet, strong eyes.

"'As the water ran out the silk sank now on one side, now on the other. Once it started to roll. Both the men grunted and sat up very straight. Suddenly one of them cried out:

"'There's the bottom!'

"At this the mass of silk settle against something. I heard the last water gurgle as it ran out. Then I climbed away."—Youth's Companion.

Personal Neatness is an Asset.

A foreign ambassador who has served at several large capitals of the world told of an embassy he had returned to him from a mission and announced follows. "Were you, may I ask, wearing that waistcoat?" with a thumb jerked in the direction of the crumpled garment. "I was," "Then," said his chief, "I do not marvel at your lack of success."

Next to a cheery manner a neat appearance is any man's best capital. The two together create an atmosphere in which "luck" likes to linger. Success will not come to those you subtlety unless you look inviting and agreeable.—Christian Herald.

Northern Michigan

East Jordan Enterprise: Roy Pantz, who has resided in this section for some years was taken in hand by officer H. Cook on Tuesday for selling fish without a license and giving short weight at that. He decided that it would be better to comply with the law in the future.

Some excitement was caused in Petoskey Thursday morning when the report was circulated that a body had been found by workmen engaged in pulling "dead heads" from Bear River near the McMannus bridge. The body was that of a man about six feet tall, fairly well dressed, and probably had been in the water a long time. Its condition was such as to render identification well nigh out of the question. Of course any attempt to explain how the man came to his death is at best only guess work. After considerable investigation the body was identified as that of Talbot Smith who had been missing for several weeks. No conclusion could be reached however, as to how the man met his death.

A notable event for Traverse City this year will be the state meeting of the Congregational churches of Michigan May 19-20. This is the first time this state meeting has ever gone north of Cadillac in the lower peninsula. The Congregationalists are one of the strongest religious bodies of the state. At the annual meeting each church in the state is entitled to representation by its pastor and one delegate. The program is divided in part to business, but each day able and distinguished men of the church give addresses. On this program will appear such speakers as Dr. Bishop of Grand Rapids, Prof. Evans of Cambridge, Mass., Dr. Gunsaulus of Chicago, Dr. Hurst of Detroit and Ex-Gov. Osborn at the Brotherhood meeting.

The West-Michigan Pike, Michigan's most distinctive highway, may be made a part of the famous Dixie highway being projected by southern road building enthusiasts from the gulf coast north. At the present time there is considerable controversy whether South Bend or Chicago shall be made the terminal of the Dixie highway, and West Michigan pike enthusiasts are pulling for South Bend. Louis H. Conger, secretary of the association, asserts, however, it would be a comparatively easy matter to have the West Michigan pike then extended and run the road north to the straits of Mackinac. This would give a transcontinental highway from the south to the north, similar to the Lincoln highway now being projected from the east to the west.

OUR SPARROWS

One of the earliest arrivals in the spring in this vicinity is the song sparrow, and everyone should be familiar with his song, which is so joyous and is constant during the spring months.

One who will take the pains to observe will find a variety of sparrows here, all of them splendid songsters. The residents are the Vesper, Chipping, Savanna and Song Sparrows, and the common spring migrants are Fox Sparrow, White-throated, White-crowned, Field and Nelson's Sharp Tailed Sparrows. There is also the Purple Finch, the female of which resembles the sparrow very much, and is often mistaken for one. Another one of the finches who visits us is the Pine Liskin, a rare but regular migrant often mistaken for a sparrow.

The English or House Sparrow is less numerous than some of the others, and therefore a person attempting the description of the bird may prove unless he is able to distinguish it from other varieties, and so, unwittingly, add to a misleading some of the feathered songsters we have.

Is not this a subject worthy of thought and consideration? A Bird Lover.

SCHOOL CHILDREN WILL GIVE FIRST OF THE MAY FESTIVALS ON MAY 20TH

Arrangements for the fourth annual May festival under the auspices of the Petoskey federation of woman's clubs are completed. All concerts will be given in the high school assembly room; and the committee announces the following programs:

Thursday evening, May 20, at eight o'clock, children of the public schools, directed by the supervisor of music, will give the first concert. The program will consist of choruses cleverly arranged as a cantata in harmony with the thought of fairies, flowers and spring time, with incidental songs and instrumental music. There will be two queens, gay and dainty costuming and a comic floral stage setting. The musical work of the Petoskey public schools is of a high standard and the children may be relied upon to worthily lead the musical festival.

On the afternoon of Friday, May 20, at 3:30 o'clock, Mrs. Viola Craw Purcell of Grand Rapids, will give a "Dramatic Lecture Recital." The committee is fortunate in securing this distinguished artist who will be the first to present a piano lecture recital in a Petoskey audience. The rental will be of interest to the musical and non-musical; but it will be of real value to students of the piano. Piano students from near and far will attend Mrs. Purcell's recital.

That evening at 8 o'clock a concert of the highest order will be presented under the direction of William McCollum and Mrs. Leon Chichester. The program will be a miscellaneous one, including several selections from grand opera. In addition to leading local singers and musicians, Walter Starr will be heard in a several number.—Adv.

Iceberg Lake.

The lakes in Glacier National park that are fed by glacial water are milky white, but others are clear and just as cold—some of them are so cold that the sky and clouds above. On a clear day the water is beautifully blue, but when storm clouds gather it assumes darker shades, which make it appear dangerous and forbidding. One of the most attractive lakes in the park is Iceberg lake, so called because the glacier at its edge discharges bergs into its waters at intervals, after the manner of the glaciers found in the arctic region. The rest of the wall around this lake is so high above the water as to foster buildings like New York's skyscrapers stop one another.

The Use of Iron.

Iron has been known to man for a very long time. In the time of the Assyrian it was extensively used, iron swords, armor and other tools having been found in Layard at Nineveh, Iron was used to the Greeks of Troy, while the hardening and tempering of steel appear to have been operations so common are among the early Greeks. The employment of a kind of bellows for the forging of tools, presumably of iron, figures in Egyptian sculpture of 3200 B. C. Cast iron appears to have been discovered about 500 B. C. Through the agency of the Romans the manufacture of iron was introduced all over the then known world.

Miss J. E. Vandelinde, Kirkland, Ill., writes—"On account of nursing a relative through three months' serious illness, I was run down greatly, nervous, could hardly eat or sleep. That I did not break down, I am convinced, was due to several bottles of Electric Bitters I then took. I am never without them in the house and recommend them to others."

NO POLITICS NOW

The man who will talk politics now should be taken out behind the barn and the foolishness extracted from him with a pump.

Moreover, the axiom, "Our country, right or wrong," does not enter into the argument. Our country is right in expressing its condemnation of German methods of warfare.

Therefore, no politics, gentlemen. As Americans we are behind the president to the limit—war or peace.

In the piping times of peace we perfunctorily send up the flag, here and there, we pass under it perhaps thoughtlessly; but not until an affront comes to our country do we realize what the flag means to us.

Unfurl it to the breeze! Uncover as you pass under it; salute it as it passes you. It stands for liberty and justice; now so flagrantly ignored by a great power. It means a united country against the world.

At the crucial moment we lift our eyes to Old Glory and renew our pledge of loyalty to it, and the principles for which it stands.

Here's to the flag and the president.

CONCERNING AUTOMOBILES

Secretary of State Vaughan is confident that there will be more than 100,000 licensed automobiles in the state of Michigan at the end of the present year. Already the state department has issued 70,000 licenses, which is 9,000 in excess of the total number delivered in 1914.

Under the present law all automobiles are required to pay a state license fee of $5, but the passage of depressing native Newell Smith's bill during the recent session of the legislature will necessitate a radical change in the method of collecting the state fee for next year.

The Smith bill provides that automobiles shall pay a state license based on the weight and horse power of the car. The new bill prescribes that the secretary of state shall collect a fee on the basis of twenty-five cents per horse power and twenty-five cents per horse power of the machine. In lieu of the state fee automobiles are exempt from local taxation.

COMMON COUNCIL

At the council Monday night, H. D. Marshall was awarded the contract for laying the Lewis street and Petoskey avenue sewer.

The petition for the payment of State street was laid on the table until a sewer petition is filed.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

John Henry On the Rubes of New York

SAY! did you ever put on your things and go out hunting for an apartment on little old Manhattan Isle?

It's a Gentle Pastime—take it from Uncle Hank!

It's an exercise that brings into play all the historic unused muscles of the pocketbook.

As you grow more familiar with the Mysteries of the Game you see what a fatal mistake you made in not being born rich, and as your faltering feet take you from one Palatial Dungalow to another you berate the Destiny which failed to make you a hotel clerk in Sharon, Pa., or a soda water operator in Dawson, W. Va.

Peaches, having tired of hotel life, hears in mutter incoherently from time to time about "a sweet little nest of our own."

Aw-well, indeed! I had a friend once who built a nest in an uptown apartment house and things matters acre a strange bird flew in and slopped with his wife. He sat on the nest.

Friend wife was insistent, however, so finally we set forth in quest of a haven of rest where she should no longer be at the mercy of tip-sodden waiters and money-mad bell hops.

Letting go of the life line, we swam out into the upper reaches of Broadway in search of a Rental Agency and were soon beyond hope of rescue.

Over there on our port bow loomed (barely) and fascinating entrance to Wash a Spider's and like a million other flys we fell for it.

Assuming that air of languid indifference which is popularly supposed to indicate excessive moneyed interests, we gave the high sign to a gold-braided functionary at the entrance and eased ourselves into the silver-plated covers where they take your money for an apartment.

The Rental Agency of Webb & Spider was the velvet goods—take it from an agitated shoeshiner! Adorning the walls were paintings the like of which Rembrandt or Corot would have been proud, and of sufficiently big toxicated. Mahogany and plate glass did mean work all over the shop and the soft murmur of thrush-throated typewriters gave an atmosphere of sufficient betting a place where money is painlessly extracted.

We were wading through a carpet with plush up to our ankles when suddenly appeared in our pathway one Sydney D'Brite the lad with a map like a cow—the original Brother of the Ox.

No doubt you know this well-to-do who always shines and look conscious when accused of having Bovine Eyes, but did you ever catch the fellow with a whole face like a cow?

Sydney D'Brite is the answer. Every time you look around you think of the Beef Trust and shudders.

Two blocks away we fell under the spell of a shack called the Ipsydocus. A Cuban refugee met us at the door and dared us to come in.

We were offered an apartment on the eleventh floor which had never been occupied. The reason was obvious. The walls were too close together.

It might be a success as a place to press autumn leaves, but not as a place to live in unless the tenants went through life standing up. We therefore declined with thanks and walked out backward, having little fells in Cuban refugees.

Presently Peaches found a nibble. It was a gingerbread rookery with seven rooms and one bathroom.

It was called The Pepsinetta and it looked the part.

There were sliding doors; hot and cold gas in every room, and the janitor had self-folding arms.

The outlook provided a superb view of the uncompleted Pulitzer Building, with blasting from 6 to 8 a. m. and malaria at all hours.

Peaches went dip about the dugout, and to prove that her love was reciprocated the janitor clinched my argument.

"How is the plumbing?" I asked.

"Better," answered the janitor. "In fact, it's almost convalescent."

I suppose he thought I was talking about his Aunt Jane and let it go at that.

Peaches took me by the arm and led me through the condensed cats.

"The Lad With a Map Like a Cow."

combs, pointing out the scenery to me as she passed.

"This room," she said, trying to step into a dent in the wall, "we'll fix up as your office."

"It might make a good den for a squirrel," I suggested. "Why, I couldn't growl in a den like that."

"Oh! there's plenty of room," she cooed.

"That's only because it hasn't been papered!" I remarked, and just then the janitor came bubbling to the surface and led us to the dining room.

"How cute!" Peaches gurgled.

"It is cute," I agreed, "but it looks more like a mousetrap."

Anyway, the place pleased Peaches so I was game to hang up my hat there if she was.

"How much?" I said to Charles Pepperface, the janitor.

"Three thousand," he answered with out a tremor.

"Far!" I inquired blandly.

"For this apartment," he cross-examined.

"Three thousand dollars a year—each month in advance—no dogs—no children—no tango parties—no piano playing after 11 p. m.—you kind And with the grocer, butcher, laundry and bootblacker that I transact and so—"

I turned to look at Peaches. She was in the elevator, gasping for breath. I joined her in the elevator and I'm gasping.

We stopped all the way back to the hotel.

Webb Spy D'Brite was right about that Rube proposition.

Peaches and I cut down to the wholesale dealers in furniture on Broadway to our cars we closed our eyes and pitched a cozy cottage with its green shutters and ivy climbing up the porch; a bit of lawn where roses strayed with the honeysuckle for our admiration.

"That's the real Rube has all the best of it."

Surest thing you know!

Troublesome Cargo.

"An elephant's shoulder is never still" is a Hindu saying with reference to the restlessness of the animal. An Scandinavian tells how the elephant's passion for moving about once came near wrecking a ship.

A number of elephants were taken on board a vessel at Calcutta and the steamer went down the Hooghly river. At night it anchored off Sanger point. The sea was as still as oil, but the ship rolled so much that she was in danger of going over. The shoulders had found that by swaying to and fro all together they could produce a rolling motion. As the ship had no other cargo and rode light the animals was soon dangerous. The mahouts, or keepers, were hurried down to hold, and each one, seated on his own beast, made him "break step," but they had to stay there for a long time.

Storing Coal in Water.

The advantage of storing coal under water where deterioration is much less than in the air, are appealing more and more strongly to engineers. It has been generally recognized that the gases concealed in the pores of the coal are called "the Italiandons—because it was good for sore eyes.

An abrupt person with a drooping mustache no! is which the quarter-deck and began to mention large sums of money accompanying with a gleam year and going on up till he bit his tongue.

We merely swallowed our patience and fell back two paces to the rear.

When the abrupt person passed for a moment at "A duplex for $14,000 a year" we turned and ran like a couple of jack rabbits on the way home to dinner.

Byd was one of the ushers at our wedding and he didn't know why I knew why I ever let that human Hamburger crack he is and he knew why I knew why for our pickles. All he could do was to put his face where I could see it and he was a success.

And here he was again, dancing gleefully into our dugout and gibbering like a sink with an unbuttoned brain.

"Well, well!" Byd chortled. "Isn't this a surprise, though? John Henry and Peaches! Hiiiii! Looking for an apartment, eh?"

"No, Byd," I came back, after shaking a limp mitt. "No, we were playing golf up Broadway and I happened to slice a ball through the ventilator; so we came in after it!"

Byd believed jocosely: "Ha, ha! Same old John Henry! Gee I'm glad to see you. What are you doing down in you? How high you want to go?"

"Not above the sixth floor," I answered.

"Oh, I don't mean that—how high?" Byd asked.

"Well, not above 110th Street," I ventured.

"You don't get me," Byd complained. "I mean the price—how high you want to go in price?"

"Oh!" I said; "something reasonable."

"How would $6,000 strike you?" Byd inquired.

"It would strike me below the belt," I told him. "I said we wanted something reasonable.

"Well," Byd chuckled, "six thousand a year is reasonable nowadays. We have apartments ranging all the way from $6,000 up to $30,000 a year."

"You may keep all with my compliments, Byd," I informed him. "What I'm looking for is a place to live in, and a hand-painted cabaret in which dinner.

OLDEST OF TEXAS RANGERS RETIRES

Threats on His Life Led Captain John R. Hughes Into the Service.

NEVER LOST A BATTLE

In Continuous Service Since 1887 and Was Promoted From Private to Present Rank by Superiors Being Killed.

Yoloia, Tex.—Capt. John R. Hughes, the oldest ranger in the state service in point of years, is to retire. His resignation has been handed in after a continuous service since 1887. He entered as a private and on July 4, 1891 was made a corporal, all of his superior officers having been killed in desperate fights with force border bandits.

He was led to talk about himself and his career. He petered it in his simple, plain words.

The tale as he told it follows:

"Before I enlisted in the ranger force, I was a ranchman on the line of Travis and Williamson counties. A band of thieves stole about seventy-five head of horses from my ranch. Among them were sixteen head of mules. I followed them to New Mexico, got all my horses back and a lot of my neighbors' horses. The band of mules were confiscated for stolen horses, and sent to the New Mexico penitentiary.

Threats Made Him Ranger.

"I just lacked fifteen days being gone a year on that trip. When I returned home I resumed my ranch and went about attending to my stock and working to be a good citizen of the world. The friends of the men that I had killed while in New Mexico got not let me alone. One of them came to the ranch to kill me. I was absent but a ranger had arrived at the ranch just after I had left. The ranger was hunting the man who was hunting me. They exchanged shots. The ranger shot the pistol out of his hand, but the man got away.

"He was wanted for murder, and some other offenses. The ranger asked me to help catch the men. About three weeks later we rounded him up but, unfortunately, he would not surrender, and was killed. His friends then were so annoying to me that I could not go without my arms so the ranger persuaded me to enlist in the company with him.

"I enlisted at Georgetown August 10, 1887, expecting to stay six or eight months. I remained uninterrupted service at Camp Wood in Nueces Canyon. November 12, having ordered in that time about seven hundred miles on horseback. That same winter we moved camp to Pilot Knob. We stayed on the lower Rio Grande a year and a half, during which time we had some exciting times.

Arrested War Leader.

"Among other things the Garza war was started. I arrested Catarina Garza, in August, 1888, for criminal conspiracy and carried him to Fort Sobra. Sebra afterward shot Garza and two companies of rangers were sent there to attend to the mob. I was the first ranger to arrive.

"Unfortunately I have been in several engagements where desperate criminals were slain. I have never lost a battle that I was in personally, and never let a prisoner escape. The longer I held a prisoner the closer I watch him. I have never been indicted for a grand jury. I have been stationed at Austin a good deal of the time.

"I got my promotions all the way from private to captain by my superior officers being killed by Mexican bandits. Sergt. Charles Punselman was killed by Mexican sharpshooters in the Franklin mountains, April 17, 1890. I took his place. Capt. Frank Jones was killed on Pirate island by Mexicans on June 30, 1893, and I was promoted to Governor Hogg to fill his place. My appointment as captain is dated July 4, 1893. Pirate island was I did not expect to live to the age I have lived now. I expected to be killed by criminals.

"I have a scrapbook that is very interesting to all outsiders, and a great many of my friends want me to write a book of my life as a ranger, but I don't expect to ever do so for several reasons. One of them is that I do not crave notoriety. Another is that I do not need the money. I have accumulated enough of this world's goods to be able to keep the wolf from the door. I am not rich, however."

Has Been in Several Engagements

"BILL" IS LANDED AT LAST

Persistent Practical Joker Expected a Pig, Express Company Delivered Porcupine.

Milwaukee—Bill Rood, train crier at the Union depot, has at last had it slipped over on him. He admits it as he passed sadly upon the trefful and unpleasant experience which cost him $2.16 in express charges.

Bill has enjoyed the reputation of being the most persistent practical joker in railroad circles, and it has become his pride to be prepared against the unusual.

One night he expected a young pig from a farmer friend up in the state. A large box arrived. Bill cheerfully paid the express charges. He was in his surprise to find the angry, quill shooting resin bag contained, but he was equal to the occasion and sent the porcupine out again on the 4:00 train to a friend miles away.

WOMAN KILLS 13 WILD CATS

Washington Matron Hunts Animals for the Bounty Placed by the County.

Tacoma, Wash.—Mrs. O. G. Shaw of Elections, the only woman hunter of the county who makes wild cats her chief pastime, brought her first trophy this season to County Auditor Morris' office and received the bounty of $5 allowed under the law.

Mrs. Shaw brought in a dozen pelts of wild cats last year and was paid bounty on twenty-five. Six of these she killed while driving along a country road in her automobile. The latter animal stopped out in front of the machine. Throwing on the brakes Mrs. Shaw brought out her rifle and killed the cat.

Amiable Husband, This.

New York—In her suit for separation Mrs. Henry P. McNamara says her husband had her photographs perfectly fine in his room and that he threatened to parboil her when she removed some of them.

TERROR TO PUGILISTS, HIS WIFE BEATS HIM

Boxer Admits She Made Him "Take Count," So Seeks Divorce.

New York.—Johnny Dundee, lightweight prize fighter, who has handily sent in the count many an antagonist of the ring, says he is no match for his wife, who, according to charges he has filed, has made it unsafe for him to longer live with her.

Dundee put his charged grievances in affidavit form and attached the affidavit to his complaint in a suit for separation filed in the supreme court. The action is recorded as being brought by Joseph Carroro. Dundee's real name, against Lucille Carroro.

He says he was married on June 26, 1912, and one child was born. This is Lucille, now two years old. Almost from the day of the wedding, Dundee alleges, his wife made trouble for him. Often he foregave her on her promise to make her ways, but she always relapsed into her habit of beating him when things went wrong.

She committed acts of violence against the "pride of his affiliated runs," striking him over the head with china dishes, shoes and brica-brac, and more particularly almost daily during the month of February last and daily from then to March 10 she filed strike and beat the plaintiff over his head with dishes while he was asleep."

It was on March 10 that Dundee says, he decided he could stand it no longer and would bring suit.

SHAMROCK THWARTS DIVORCE

Sprig Arrives in Nick of Time and California Couple Are Reconciled.

San Francisco—A sprig of shamrock is a bit faded and crumbled as the result of its long journey from Kerry. It was the means of uniting Mrs. Margaret Murphy and her husband, John, in Superior Judge Flood's court, after they had decided to part forever.

Margaret claimed John was cruel, and would come home never sober than on her Sunday dinners. She left him and filed a divorce complaint. The day she came to her home a letter came from her mother in Kerry John took to the saloon and was summoned to court. Mrs. Murphy opened it and on felt the sprig of shamrock. Margaret picked up the bit of verdure and looked at John. He had seen nothing but his apostle. Hesitating a moment she tore the sprig in two, and, grasping her husband, placed half of it in his hat.

A moment later out came John with Margaret on his arm.

The Fever of Sin

By REV. L. W. CONWELL
Assistant to the Pres., Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

TEXT—And when Jesus was come into Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother laid, and sick of a fever. And he touched her hand, and the fever left her, and she arose, and ministered unto them.—Matthew 8:14, 15.

Peter's house was in Capernaum. He was a native of Bethsaida, but he have changed his residence to suit Christ's ministry the better! It was in this house at Capernaum that his wife's mother lay sick, as the text records. Her fever and its cure suggests the fe.ers of sin and Christ's dealing with it.

Sickness.

Fever brings heat. Lust or drink creates a fire in the blood, and the fever of covetousness is no less consuming. Men seem sometimes to be in a delirium of rage against the Christ and the mercies he has so stricken down by men who were in a paradise if no other reason save that these preached Christ.

Fever brings restlessness. Sin does not satisfy and the wicked are like the troubled sea, which cannot rest.

> Like the rough sea, that cannot rest,
> Are the souls of men
> A thousand things woken your breast
> Allow you not to be.

A young man of wealth once went to Dr. Prothes Winslow, seeking relief for a peculiar mental disorder. The distinguished physician called and so unlady which medicine could supply and at last obtained from the young man a confession that his trouble came from the fact that he was haunted, in the midst of luxury, with this question, "Where shall I spend eternity?"

Fever is attended by thirst. Christ appealed to a weary world when he cried, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." Only those who have tried the broken cisterns of earth can stop with full appreciation that line in the old hymn, "Jesus hath satisfied, Jesus is mine."

Soundness.

As the first step towards the cure, "Jesus came into Peter's house." We sound the good news that he is not far from any of us. Many testify to the reality of divine power in their lives, and Charles Spurgeon declared that for many years he was never for fifteen minutes without the conscious presence of Christ.

There then came actual contact with the sick woman. "He touched her hand." How wonderfully it illustrates the fact that he bore our sicknesses, taking hold of the seed of Abraham. He is not an absentee God, but a present Helper, laying his hand upon our overwhelming ills. Cleansing the rabbis had a saying that when the sick man opened his eyes deep for them to get the dead grass. There are several hundred in sight of here most of the time. There are several cattle ranches north of here that have been opened to the public of late. One man I know sold $45,000 worth of fat cattle this fall. He takes his cattle on farms where they have lots of straw and water, paying 75 cents a bushel per bushel, or 12 cents a bushel straw to winter 400 or 500 head they have fed and watered and have a man to look after the cattle.—Advertisement.

His Question.

"Seven men out of every ten are confounded horses!" emphatically declared Alexander Hamilton, in his deceptic dissertation!

"Why, except the other Gloom, the widely known and cordially detested Mr. Gloom?"

His Action.

"Ah, sauire," saluted the village boor, "have you any idea thy rear rheumatism those days?"

"Examining the doctors one after another" snarled the old codger, "to see how much they lie under St. Sophia that the Turks, and few indeed have been the Christians who have entered the Imperial Ottoman Museum, which is housed in the former Byzantine Palace, "view under very the Museum's collection of Ottoman, Persian, Greek and Roman antiquities, including the mummified bodies Sophia itself, given the Christian Orthodox Church, which tantalized him with the sight of the Holy Grail, or cup of the Last Supper, which Russia would be the rightful heir, and on the subject of the Turks would not permit a close examination.

Bargaining goes with the Turk, but thought of what the fact that has been accumulating since the year of the conquest by Mohammed II. may contain. It is doubtful if many treasures in gold and silver and gems will be found, though the Turks have taken from Constantinople many precious manuscripts of the classics may be discovered are greater "Splendid library, contains probably practically all the lost classics, are undoubtedly hidden in cellars.

"There are known to be 3,000 manuscripts in the sultan's library which have been seen, and the only results, the Turkish Ambassador, the chief hope of scholars lies in their trust in one of the least objectionable traits of the Moslem, the belief that everything is written and fated on it. Even if he does sacrifice pictures and statues, he cannot destroy them. In consequence the name of God should be written on them. Had it not been for the superstition the world would be very much poorer in the old learning than it is today."

Apart from the strategic and political value it must be remembered that Constantinople is to the Mohammedan what Rome is to the Roman Catholics, and for the last 500 years in particular it has constituted the principal object of all Muscovite religious and political aspirations. Without attaching any credence whatever to the purely mythical testament of Peter the Great about Constantinople, a document which was never held of the beginning of the nineteenth century, nearly a hundred years after his death, and which is a forgery concocted by the Pole Sokolnicki and the Frenchman Lesseur, at the instance of the first Napoleon Napoleon, there is no doubt that Czar Peter had yet his heart upon the acquisition of Constantinople and had instructed his successors, his people as a national ideal.

However, whatever may be the authenticity or genuine or not the fact is it does embody national aspirations, and has had a great effect on Russian diplomacy.

Catherine the Great was equally bent upon transferring the seat of Muscovite power from Petersburg, and from Moscow, to Stamboul, and when Napoleon I and Alexander I planned to partition Turkey, they intended that Moscow, the Muscovite ruler insisted upon the possession of Constantinople on political and religious grounds, declaring it to be "the key to the door of Russia." Napoleon would not and could not consent to this, giving utterance to his celebrated and historic phrase, "No, the possession of Constantinople by Russia would mean the mastery of the world."

It was this question about Constantinople that caused the break of the friendship of the emperors and an enmity which resulted in Napoleon's disastrous invasion of Russia, with his greater disaster, in the destruction of Moscow by fire, in the coalition of Russia with Great Britain, Prussia, Sweden and Austria, France, and the invasion of the latter country by the allies, in the disastrous defeat of Napoleon at Leipsic and at Waterloo, in the loss of his throne and in his exile first to Elba, and then to St. Helena.

The "will" to possess Constantinople that famous not of the Czar Nicholas, who just before the Crimean war, said to the British ambassador, apropos of Turkey, that "we have on our hands a sick man—a very sick man. It will be, I tell you frankly, a great misfortune if one of these days he should slip away from us: especially before all the necessary arrangements have been made." The English ambassador was strictly noncommittal even after the czar had pointed out the horrors of a general Europe's war which might ensue if the great powers were not carefully, if the Russian autocrat repeated his remark about the sick man at Sebastopol, the old Metternich, the celebrated wit, who was the Austrian ambassador, and it was Metternich who cynically turned the tide against any Russian occupation by Russia in handing the Turkish situation, by remarking curtly, "Aliens, the sick man, thought, is your majesty speaking as the doctor in the case or as the heir?" Yet that the other powers turned against Russian pretensions, and on all subsequent occasions in various combinations, both in 1853 and 1877, backed the "sick man" against any doctoring by which Russia would be the resident legatee. And so events moved on for 60 years, the 60 years of the reckoning came, and Russia fired the Serbian powder barrel and Armageddon was on.

While it is an exaggeration, at any rate in these modern times, to ascribe the mastery of the world to the possession of Constantinople, it cannot be denied that they controlled, if not dictated, from a strategic and from an economic point of view, one of the most valuable and important sites in the world. It is a natural fortress of great strength, protected as it is in the rear by the Sea of Marmora, and in front by a river to attack by land, by those wonderful straits, the Dardanelles and the Bosporus, which furnish a matchless a defense against any onslaught from the sea.

If the at the very point where Europe and Asia meet and which connects the Black sea with the Mediterranean and the Atlantic ocean, by way of the Suez canal and the Red sea. When the railroad now in course of construction from Jamid to the head of the Persian gulf, via Konia and Bagdad, is completed, which will connect the Black sea with Mediterranean, and quickest route from Europe to India, Constantinople will become perhaps the most important station along the line both as regards freight and passenger traffic.

Even the existing trade route to India via the Suez canal would be endangered by Russia's possession of Constantinople, and it is to be hoped that Karl Grey, in submitting in parliament the Russian proposal to Great Britain for control of neutralize and would not oppose its free access to the Mediterranean from the Black sea through the Bosporus and Dardanelles, was very careful not to say Russia should be given Constantinople at once.

HARD TIMES.

"What's become of the old-fashioned joker who used to answer, when asked if he was married, 'No, I'm in business for myself?'"

"Gone the way of the dodo, I guess."

"Cramped? Say, lend me $10, will you? I want to stretch myself."

CONSTANTINOPLE, PICTURE CITY of the WORLD—

"ISTAMBOUL," "the place ever there," as the Moslem perversion of the Greek phrase "In the city" is often translated, has been sung by poets and painted by artists and been the theme of almost intemperate eulogy since its early days when, and the picturesque little Greek city of Byzantium, it stood for the ostentatious settlement of Greek culture in Europe, a tower of light shining over the barbaric Orient that lay within its eight arcons the way. From these early days of Alexander the Great, of Xerxes, of Darius, the home of commerce and most cosmopolitan of all missionaries, the inauguration of the city as the capital of the eastern empire by Constantine on the eleventh of May, 330, was not unworthy, though nothing like the story told by the eleven hundred and twenty-three years of imperial splendor before it fell into the hands of Mohammed II. on May 29, 1453, on that fatal fateful of all days when the emperor Constantine XI. went down before the crescent and the green flag of Islam desecrated the holy places as the conqueror rode into the city through the gate of St. Romanus. As he entered the palace the new ruler was heard to recite, as tradition has it, some lines of Persian poetry running as follows:

"The spider has spun her web in the palace of the Cassars,
"The owl has sung her song in the towers of Afrasiab."

Supersession, with its inevitable history, as in the city. Its present-day aspect, as the long revenge of the Turk, is a time hastens to its final satisfaction, and the crescent that will replace the crescent are already in the making, is one that is more redolent and reflective of the Arabian down-at-the-heels Orient than of the earlier centuries. It is a medley of museums and minarets, of magnificence and squalor, of kiosks and cafes, Persian jeelie mingling with and enchanting kiosks, in Saracenic style, gay in color of stone, stucco or tile, and with superb metal work, and side by side with the cheapest and most commonplace of frame houses and mean cafes. Broad open squares, like unscaped back alleys and lined to thoroughfares, and others imported from the old countries. They run on the range nearly all the year. The owners put up wild hay to feed them in the winter and they are fattened for them to get the dead grass. There are several hundred in sight of here most of the time. There are several cattle ranches north of here that have been opened to the public of late. One man I know sold $45,000 worth of fat cattle this fall. He takes his cattle on farms where they have lots of straw and water, paying 75 cents a bushel per bushel, or 12 cents a bushel straw to winter 400 or 500 head they have fed and watered and have a man to look after the cattle.—Advertisement.

The Cardinal's Enemy

A Bit of History That Is Also a Romance.

By F. A. MITCHEL

If one were asked what period in history furnished the most intense drama he might be right in replying that containing the administration of the government of Louis XIII. of France by Cardinal Richelieu. Louis' queen, Anne of Austria, was a bitter opponent of the cardinal, and what Richelieu was to the king the Duchess of Chevreuse was to the queen. The duchess was one of the most beautiful, the most attractive and the most intriguing woman ever lived.

After the exposure of a treasonable plot the cardinal imbibed her to Loraine, where she infuriated the king, Louis XIII., making him up a member conspiracy. The cardinal's policy forbade him to imprison a woman, so his or banishment from France had failed he sent Mme. Chevreuse to a country estate she owned. There, having no better subject for her fascination, she bewitched an octogenarian official.

This amusement failing to satisfy her, she turned her attention to another intrigue with a view to overturning the queen's and her own detested enemy, Richelieu.

At this time the queen was secretly corresponding with those opposing the cardinal, among them Mme. de Chevreuse. The person who conducted this correspondence was one La Porte, her secretary. He was the keeper of her jewelry case, translated her letters intended for them to their destination and received the replies, handling them in the same way.

But the cardinal was watching and suspected the frequent going and coming of the man. One of the queen's supposed adherents was won over and told La Porte that he was going to Brussels, where Mme. de Chevreuse was held in restriction, and asked if he had any message for her. If so he would carry it. La Porte replied that he had a letter and would bring it to him. While doing so he was arrested with the queen's letter on his person and lodged in the Bastille. The letter was not important, but the queen and her friend had been forbidden to correspond. The cardinal at once ordered the seizure of the private papers of both the queen and the duchess.

When the queen was accused of treason she falsely made an oath that she had not corresponded with any foreign monarch. Richelieu knew better, and on promise of the king's pardon the queen confessed that she had written her relatives in Madrid and in Brussels, but not on matters of state. La Porte declared that he had carried no letters for the queen except to Mme. de Chevreuse. Feeling that La Porte's statement and hers would not agree, Anne desired to post him on what she had declared and ask him to make the same statement. This she hoped would satisfy Richelieu and prevent his investigating further.

But how reach La Porte in his cell at the Bastille? So carefully watched was he that a warden quitted him only for a few hours during the day and slept in his cell at night. One of the queen's maids of honor and devoted to her, Mlle. de Hautfort, not only surrendered a plan of conveying a letter to La Porte, but volunteered to carry it herself.

Van Chevalier de Jars, who had been involved in a former conspiracy against the cardinal, was confined in the Bastille and occupied a cell directly over that of La Porte, though between the chevalier's and La Porte's cell were two others. It was hoped by the queen's adherents that De Jars might find some way of conveying a letter from the queen to La Porte. De Jars had suffered a paralytic stroke and was allowed the privileges of an invalid, being permitted to receive friends and converse with them in the courtyard of the prison.

Mlle. de Hautfort early one morning passed from the palace of the Louvre before the inmates were awake, being dressed in the costume of a midshipman. Mademoiselle's hair, which was luxuriant and beautiful, was concealed under a large cuff, and she was rolled in a loose gown which concealed her superb figure. Clothes a fleece, she was driven to the Bastille, where she asked to see the Chevalier de Jars, saying that she was a lady's maid of a slice of the Chevalier and bore a message for him.

The hour was before the prisoners' time of rising, and the queen's maid of honor was obliged to wait in the guardroom among a lot of soldiers of low degree. After some time the chevalier arrived and asked what war wanted. Mademoiselle drew him into the court and, raising her cuff, showed him who she was and handed him the queen's letter with her majesty's request that he find means to convey it to La Porte. De Jars was no coward, as he had demonstrated in the schemes in which he had embarked to overthrow the cardinal. Nevertheless he hesitated to become mixed up in a scheme which if discovered would cost him his head, but when mademoiselle reminded him of the terrible risk she was herself running he consented.

The queen's messenger returned to the palace without having been discovered. De Jars, who was full of resources, worked out the problem of getting the queen's letter to La Porte. Had the latter occupied a cell directly beneath his own he might contrive to get the letter through the floor. But no prisoner occupied the floor, whereas the room the cell below the chevalier's was occupied by some Huguenots who had been implicated in an insurrection in Bordeaux. The next cell below those held the Duchess de Chevreuse, a man named Revolliet, who had been a servant of a nobleman who had lost his head for a conspiracy against the cardinal. The chevalier planned to pass the queen's letter through these two cells to that of La Porte.

De Jars entered in his service a young fellow named Jean d'Arcy, the valet of a prisoner who was confined with his master. D'Arcy while in attendance on his master at the hour of exercise found a broken stone with a sharp point, which by eluding the observation of the sentinel he managed to slip in his pocket and at the same time secrete the old of the Huguenot prisoners. Any prisoner was ready to do anything for another unfortunate, and that night he conveyed the request. Then they were given the broken stone for a toothpick.

The men succeeded in boring a hole through the floor to the cell next below and passed the letter through to Huguenot Revolliet. These made another hole in the floor of the second cell and had not La Porte been so closely watched would have had the guilty in passing the missive on to him. They learned that the warden usually left La Porte for a few minutes in the morning. Waiting till he had left the cell, they passed down the letter.

The goal was won. La Porte made his confession tally with that of Anne of Austria, and the queen's friends were delighted. Being convinced that he had got the truth and the whole truth, he advised the king to pardon his wife, whom Richelieu believed to have been as false to her husband as Mme. de Chevreuse. The pardon was granted on condition that the queen would live in retirement at her palace with the cardinal nephew.

Anne, whose conscience was very elastic, regarded this promise solely as pertaining to exile. Richelieu was her junior and she had contrived to inform the duchess that if their machinations were found out the king and his son would receive a proper beat beneath to pass. If there was a dinner it would be bound in red and she must look out for herself. Through some blundering Mme. de Chevreuse one day received a prayer book bound in red. She decided that night.

An official whom she had confidant provided her with clothes for her recalling to Spain, and thither she received her course. Underlying her cloak, she gave out that she intended to visit friends in the neighborhood. She set out one evening in a coach as if it was dark ordered her coachman to stop and stepped out dressed as a man in a long cloak and riding boots. A horse was waiting for her, and mounted, followed by two servants also mounted, she rode southward.

In her excitement she had left the carriage the officer's directions as to the route and was obliged to proceed without them. Riding all night, she arrived at a town near Paris and called a halt. Dismounting, she ordered her servants to feed the horses, and, leaving them, she went to the inn. Seeing a man in a long cloak and riding boots, a horse with saddle and bridle standing near the door, and two servants also mounted, she rode southward.

Old Pension Plan.

They had a roundabout way of keeping military pensioner in the old days. Witness this official communication from the war office in the reign of Queen Anne. Her majesty, it runs, has ordered a pension to Thomas Mise, bull, a child, a commission as ensign in consequence of the loss of his father, who died in the service. And this too—we quote from an order in council—"Ought until further order, his army pay being sent regularly to his mother. —London Graphic.

"That has always puzzled me," replied Senator Sorghum. "There is nothing more singular than some of the speeches that politics develope."—Washington Star.

Chinese Filial Piety.

The following Chinese story illustrates the national respect for filial piety, and may, perhaps, well embarrass the husband's mother. As a punish meant the scene of the act was quickly removed, and the husband's parents, no doubt, and the mother of the wife was laudlessness, heinded and called for her disobedience. The house in which the tragedy was acted was soon after pulled to the foundations. Moreover, the school are of the district were precluded from attending public examinations, and even the substitutes were deprived of their degrees. These drastic measures were designed to render the empire filial.

Look Ahead!

There are some people who ride all through the journey of life with their backs to the horse's head. They are always looking over the track and are forever taking about the good old times and how different things were when they were young. There is no pleasure in the world now, and no freedom. The very winters and suns were not nothing to what they used to be—in fact, life is spoiled on a small, commonplace scale. Now, this is a miserable sort of thing. It brings a kind of paralyzing chill over life and sacrifices the natural relish of joy that should be forever keeping up to meet the fresh new mercies that the divine lavishes on us.—Exchange.

Foreign Objects in the Lungs.

Sir William Milligan established at a recent meeting of the Royal Medical Medicine a damson stone, a carpet tack and a coin, all of which had been inhaled into the lungs and been removed with forceps after several days of suffering on the part of the persons who had been foolish enough to put them into their mouths.

Some Forms of Rheumatism Curable

Rheumatism is a disease characterized by pains in the joints and in the muscles. The most common forms are: Acute and Chronic Rheumatism, Rheumatic Sciatica, Sciatic Rheumatism and Lumbago. All of these types can be helped absolutely by applying some good liniment that penetrates. An application of Sloan's Liniment two or three times a day to the affected part will give instant relief. Sloan's Liniment is good for pain, and especially Rheumatic Pain, because it penetrates to the seat of the trouble, soothes the affected part and draws the pain. Sloan's Liniment is all medicine. Missing the Mississippi.

The Mississippi river had more than a dozen native names, different designations being given at different points in its course. The Algonquins called it the Meche-sebe, other tribes termed it Tamesee, Alico, Tulmahasee, Senah Ili and other names. The Algonquin name was finally adopted by the white for the whole river. The meaning is "father of waters," or "the whole river." Twenty-seven spellings are noted in the writings of early explorers.—Minneapolis Journal.

Love.

Properly there is only one verb for love. It is not "amo." It is not "I love." It is not the softest Italian word. No mind language of man knows it. Not the violin knows it, and the wild bird knows it; even the sea knows it. The rose is it, and the moon is it. And the look of a man's eyes into a woman's is it, and the look of a woman's eyes back again is it. But no tongue or pen can say it in any language that endures. —"Love Letters of Use Fleet."

Warrington, an American adventurer, and James, his servant, with a caged parrot, tie into Rangoon and down the Irrawaddy as Parrot & Co., are bound for Bangkok to mark a deal for a teak concession, stop Warrington and seize the career he introduces him, his wife and Paul. Warrington has beaten a gambling and drunk Paul into a stupor. Mrs. Warrington, who loves Paul, offers her jewels and herself for Paul and they pass two sodden nights together on the river. Martha, Paul's companion, warns her that there is a "Number Two" waiting for her husband. Paul, sober, pays his debts and overtures an interview in a row over cards, finds that the row is caused by an unknown, Prince Chai, and threatens to shoot. Mrs. Warrington, in a panic, pleads with Paul and seeks him with a loaded revolver. Prince Mike Ghika, gambler, Warrington discovers is the man he expected to find, and tells him his business love and his duty to him. Mrs. Warrington, in her cabin, finds Prince Mike, who offers her protection from Paul, who thinks he may be in danger from the resentment of his cohorts. Craig is alcohol.

Warrington turned his dull eyes upon his accomplice. "Shall I do it, you? I understand you were on board Wall" accompanied-ally.

"I've been looking for you. Bygones are bygones, and what's done can't be undone by punishment. A fellow's head I'm not looking for trouble," went on Craig, gaining assurance, "I am practically down and out myself. What stake are you going to take on board here? That's all I want to know."

"It would give me great pleasure, Craig, to take you by the scruff of your neck and drop you overboard. But as you say, what's been done can't be remedied by beating in a man's head. Well, here you are, since you ask. If you speak to me, I'll catch you playing cards or sentimentally a pose. If you make yourself obnoxious to any of the passengers, I promise to give you the finest thrashing you ever had, the moment we reach Penang. If you don't go ashore there, I'll do it in Singapore. Have I made myself clear?"

"That's square enough, Paul, said the gambler resignedly. There wasn't much money on board these twenty-four boats, anyhow, so he wasn't losing much.

Warrington turned forward. "Paul? You said Paul?"

"Why, yes," wonderingly.

"Better go."

"All right." Craig returned to his mattress. "Now, what made him cut up like that, I wonder? I called him Paul! Bah!" He dug a hole in his pillow and tried to sleep.

"Paul!" murmured Warrington.

He stared down at the frames of phosphorescence calmly. The man had called him Paul. After ten years he heard the damnable nickname of it. Suddenly he clenched his hand and struck the rail. He would go back. All his loyalty, all his chivalry, had gone for naught. This low rascal had called him Paul.

CHAPTER IX.

Two Short Weeks.

When Elsa stepped out of the compartment the next morning she winced and shut her eyes. The whole arc of heaven seemed hung with fire-opals; east, west, north and south, whichever way she looked, there was dazzling iridescence. What a wonderful world! What a versatile mistress was nature! Never two days alike, never two human beings; animate and inanimate, all things were singular. She pressed her hand and watched the thread of frothing water that chased ruffles in the red water line. Never two living things alike, in all the millions and millions examined the whole. What a marvel! Even though this man Warrington and Arthur looked alike, they were not alike in heart and mind they were as different as two days.

She began her usual walk, and in passing the smokeroom door on the port side she met Warrington coming out. How deeper his eyes were! He was about to go on, but she looked graciously into his eyes and he stopped. She inspired and held out her hand.

"I really believe you were going to snub me."

"Then you haven't given me up?"

"Never mind what I have or have not done." Pleasantly: "I am going to talk. Listen to me. If what I say is distasteful, don't hesitate to interrupt me. You interest me, partly because you are like a boy, partly because you are a man."

"I haven't any manners."

"They need shaking up and roughing. I have just been musing over a remarkable thing; there are two objects are alike. Even the most accurate microscopic camera proves two nails without variation. So it is with humans. You look so like the man I knew back home that it is impossible not to ponder over you. She smiled like his friend. "Why should nature produce two persons who are mistaken for each other, and yet give them two souls, two intellects, totally different? is nature experimenting, or is she sixty seeing a trick on humanity?"

"Let us call it a trick; by all means, let us call it that."

"Top time."

"Yes, yes," impatiently; "you are going to say that it sounds bitter. But why should another man have a face like mine, when we have nothing in common? What right had he to look like me?"

"It is a puzzle," Elsa admitted.

"The man who looks like me will have no doubt it affects you odd—probably! Ever in a crowd there's a gentleman of your own class, whose lines and features are cut from the same pattern as your own. Well, that is as it should. A woman man and as you are ought to marry an equal, a man whose mind and manners are on the high plane he finds in your affection and in your world. How many worlds there are, man-made and heavenmade, and each as deadly as the other, as cold and implacable! To you, who have been kind to me, I have acted like a fool. The truth is, I've been skulking. My vanity was hurt. I had the idea that it were proper and not my resemblance that appealed to your interest. What makes you trust me?" bluntly; and he stopped as he asked the question.

"Why, I don't know," blankly. Instantly she recovered herself. "But I do trust you." She walked on, imperfore he fell into her stride.

"It is because you trust the other man.

"Thanks. That is it precisely; and for nearly two weeks I've been trying to solve that very thing.

"After a pause he asked: "Have you ever read Reade's 'Singleheart and Doubleface?'

"Yes. But what bearing has it upon our discussion?"

"Show that you would understand," evasively. His tongue had nearly tripped him.

"Are you sure?"

"Of this, that I shall never understand women."

"Do not try to," she advised. "All these men who know about women are women the unhappiest."

They made a round in silence. Many an eye peered at them, and envy and admiration and curiosity brought their shafts to bear upon her, it was a fine thing to create these variant expressions of interest. She was obvious.

"We stop at Penang?" she asked.

"Five or six hours, long enough to see the town.

"We went directly from Singapore to Colombo, so we missed the town coming out. I should like to see that coconut plantation of yours."

"It is too far inland. Besides, I am persona non grata there." As, indeed, he was. His heart burned with shame and rage at the recollection of the last day there. Three or four days during the decade, the misfortune of being found out had fallen to his lot, and always when he was employed at something worth while.

Elsa discreetly neared into another channel. "You will go back to Italy, I suppose?"

"Yes, I shall go to Italy once more. But first I am going home." He was not aware of the grimness that entered his voice as he made this statement.

"I am glad," she said. "After all, that is the one place."

"If you are happy enough to find a welcome."

"And you will see y mother again?"

He winced. "Yes. Do you know, it is not even possible that I met you but two short weeks ago? I have never given much thought to this so-called reincarnation; but somewhere in the past we must have met, only you weren't going home to marry the other fellow."

Elsa stopped at the rail. "Who knows?" she replied ruminatingly. "Perhaps I am not going to marry him.

"Don't you love him?"

"I see your pardon, Miss Chetwood!"

"You're excused."

"I still need some training. I have been alone so much that I haven't got over the trick of speaking my mind aloud."

No harm has been done. The gallery with me."

"I used to learn whole pages from stories and recite them to the trees or to the parrot. It kept me from going mad, I believe. In camp I handled cookies; none of whom could speak a word of English. I didn't mind talking with me at that time. So I'd declaim, merely to hear the sound of my voice. Afterward I learned that the cookies looked upon me as a holy man. They believed I was nightly offering prayers to one of my gods. Perhaps I was; this god of reason. All that seems like a sad dream now."

"Are you going to take Ralph with you?"

"Nothing that I care to."

"Stop! I am perfectly able to take care of myself. I do not need any valet! Ch—ch!"

"He has spoken to you about me?"

"A letter. I am only his cousin and yours. I toss it up and throw it overboard. Let it go back. Somehow, I think everything seems spoiled. I am sorry I spoke."

"I shall see that he does not bother you again," ominously.

"They returned to the promenade deck in silence.

When Warrington found Craig the man was hopelessly intoxicated. He lay sprawled upon his mattress, and the kick administered did not stir him. Warrington looked down at the sodden wretch moodily.

Craig's intoxication was fortunate for him, otherwise he would have been roughly handled; for there was black murder in the heart of the broken man standing above him. Warrington relaxed his clenched hands. This evil-breathing thing at his feet was the primal cause of it all, he and a male damnable weakness. Of what use his new-found fortune? Better for him he stayed in the jungle, better have died there, hugging his poor debauch. Oh, abysmal fool that he had been!

CHAPTER X.

The Cut Direct.

It was after five in the morning when the drunkard had to get Craig to go down to his room. With the dull obstinacy of a drunken man, he refused to stir; he was perfectly satisfied to stay where he was. The three-men stood irresolute and helplessly looking around the man. Everyone had gone below. The hose was ready to flush the deck. It did not matter; he, Craig, would not budge.

"Leave me alone, you black beggars!"

"But, sahib," began one of the Lascars, who spoke English.

"Don't talk to me. I tell you, get out!" striking at their feet with his swollen hands.

Warrington, who had not lain down at all, but who had wandered about the free decks like some lost soul from the Flying Dutchman, Warrington, hearing voices, came out of the smoke room. A glance was sufficient. Devil's humor took possession of him. He walked over.

"Get up," he said quietly.

Craig blinked up at him from out of puffed eyes. "Go to the devil! Plus spectrum to order me about!"

"Will you get up peacefully? These men have work to do."

Craig was blind to his danger. "What's that to me? Go away, all of you, to the devil. For all I care, let me get up when I get damn good and ready! Not before!"

Warrington picked up the hose.

"Sahib!" cried the Lascar in protest.

"Be still!" ordered Warrington, curious for the last time, will you get up?

"No!"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

MIX SENTIMENT AND SENSE

Place Is Found for Both in the Life That Is Well and Wisely Ordered.

Few, indeed, are the persons who like to be called sentimental. The word has become associated with the idea of fickleness and weakness, and is often applied to simpering women and ethereal ideas, says the Philadelphia Ledger. The man who clings to the business policy of his father when that policy is contrary to his desires is said to be actuated by sentiment, which is often a charitable way of saying that he is too slow for the age in which he lives. The woman who has been wronged by a beloved ultimate of the night before turned and rankled, and a man of Craig's calibre never accepted the inevitable without meditating revenge, revenge of a roundabout character, such as would insure his physical safety. There was nothing loyal or generous or worthy in the man. There is something admirable in a great rascal; but a sordid one is a pitiful thing. Craig entered the smokeroom and ordered a peg. At luncheon he saw them sitting together, and he wondered a gritn. Couldn't play cards, or engineer a pool, oh! All right. There were other amusements.

That afternoon Martha contrived to sit down in a vacant chair, just out of the range of the cricketers. She lolled back and idly watched the batsmen. And then she heard voices.

"She is Elsa Chetwood. I remember seeing her pictures. She is a society girl, very wealthy, but something of a snob.

Martha's eyes tingled. A snob, indeed, because she minded principally her own affairs!

"They think because they belong to the exclusive sets they can break as many laws of convention as they please. Well, they can't. There's always some scandal in the papers about them. There was some rumor of her being engaged to the duke of Whatsits-name, but it fell through because she wouldn't settle a fortune on him. Only sensible thing she ever did, probably."

"And did you notice who sat next to her at luncheon?"

"A gentleman with a past, Mr. Craig is one."

"I dare say Miss Chetwood has a past, too, if one but knew. To travel alone like this!"

Suspicion! Martha rose indignantly and returned to the other side of the deck. She had lived too long with Paul not to have learned self-repression, and that the victory is always with those who stoop not to answer. Nevertheless, she was alarmed. Elsa must be warned.

At Elsa said was: "My dear Martha, in a few days they and their little tattle will pass out of my existence, admitting that they have ever entered it. I repeat, my life is all my own, and that I am concerned only with those whom I wish to retain as my friends. Coesta is the sinhouse of the mediocre, and, thank heaven, I am not mediocre."

While dressing for dinner Elsa discovered a note on the floor of her cabin. The writing was unfamiliar. She opened it and sought first the signature. Slowly her cheeks reddened, and her lips twisted in disdain. She did not read the note, but the natural keenness of her eye caught the name of Warrington. She tore the letter into scraps which he tossed out of the porthole. What a vile thing the man was! He had had the effrontery to sign his name. He must be punished.

It was as Lite as ten o'clock when she and Warrington went up to the bar and gazed down the cut-water. Never had sea seen anything so weirdly beautiful as the ribbons of phosphorescence which fell away on each side, luminously blue and flaked with dancing starlike particles, through which, over and anon, flying fish, dripping with the fire, spun outward like tongues of flame.

"Often, when I was sinking, during an hour or so of twilight, I used to stand up here and look down at the mystery. For it will ever be a mystery to me. And I found comfort.

"Are you religious, too?"

"In one thing, that God demands that every man shall have faith in himself.

How deep his voice was as compared to Arthur's. Arthur Elsa frowned at the rippling magic. Why was she forever comparing men with men? What significance did it have upon the future, since, at the present moment, it was not understandable?

"There is a man on board by the name of Craig," she said. "I advise you to beware of him."

"Who introduced him to you?" The anger in his voice was very agreeable to her ears. "Who dared do?"

"No one. He introduced himself on the way up to Mandalay. In Rangoon I closed the acquaintance, such as it was, with the aid of a hat pin."

"A hat pin! What did he say to you?" roughly.

"Nothing that I care to repeat."

"I am perfectly able to take care of myself. I do not need any valet! Ch—ch!"

"He has spoken to you about me?"

"A letter. I am only his cousin and yours. I toss it up and throw it overboard. Let it go back. Somehow, everything seems spoiled. I am sorry I spoke."

"I shall see that he does not bother you again," ominously.

"They returned to the promenade deck in silence.

The sailor had made its entrance into the assemblage of early spring millinery with a straight and narrow brim and many novel oddities of trimming. So much enthusiasm was developed for this trim little favorite in the millinery world that many variations in its shape were launched, and the mushroom a preference for the wide brimmed hat. It would be hard to predict just where the limit will be in the width of brim, for all ready big "curtesheet" sailors of black taffeta have captivated the fancy of women whose approval spells success for any style that they adopt.

But sailors of a conservative width of brim are, of all hats, the most attractive for summer wear. They fit the head and shade the eyes. Little variations in the size and shape and color of crowns adapt this even-brimmed hat to different faces. Oddities and novelties of trimming make a new and attractive chapter in the story of the sailor.

Three examples of the most successful types are shown here. They are representative and destined to be last out the season with an ever increasing following of admirers. For the summer outing and for the tourist trip provide the best of all round hats.

The hat of sullan at the left of the group, has a crown that rises toward the left side and is rather slanting. It is trimmed with a scarf of silk and a feather rosette having a long, slender quill standing through it. At the right the shape has a round crown trimmed with a plain band having a taper edge. A very long curled quill is thrust through both band and crown and sweeps across the front.

The third sailor is made of hemp and has a large, square crown. The brim of hemp is rather narrow, but a second brim of crepe underlies it and doubles its width. A plain band, corded at each edge, lies flat against the crown. A wide quill follows the curve of the brim, on which it is posed flat. Two flat bows of ribbon, one near the front and one over the quill, carry out the severely tailored effect that is in keeping with the shape.

Corset Covers, Pretty and Easy to Make

Two pretty and inexpensive underlies, or corset covers, are pictured here that were selected from a great assortment of similar material, as the best of their kind. One of them, shown at the left, is made of fine batiste, val lace and fine embroidery, and the other is of crepe de chine and shadow lace. Both utilize narrow lingerie ribbon in their make-up.

They are comparatively inexpensive because the underbodice is all in one piece, and requires no gores or sheerest cottons of net, chiffon or lace that is worn over it. The finest of materials are used in the pattern for fancy blouses, and they are mostly sentimentally made of fine lawns. They merely veil the underbodice, which becomes, therefore, an important item of dress.

The bodice of batiste is made with a yoke of lace. This is a fashion that is to be recommended, because it makes sleeves grow in the magnificent of which bodices are made. They are a help to the woman with too lancer arms who admits to wear the thin blouse, and they improve the "set" of the blouse and jacket on a thin figure. This is cut very simply on the regulation corset-cover lines. A band of very narrow beading, with an edging of narrow val lace, finishes the top, and a baby ribbon run through the beading adjusts the bodice to the figure.

A val insertion is let in the bodice about the top and its lattice pattern is left bare and sleeves. The sleeves are finished at the lower edge, with wide brimmed beading and a ruffle of the material, and a narrow beading, with a ribbon run through it. At the right the shape has a round crown trimmed with a plain band having a taper edge. A very long curled quill is thrust through both band and crown and sweeps across the front.

The third sailor is made of hemp and has a large, square crown. The brim of hemp is rather narrow, but a second brim of crepe underlies it and doubles its width. A plain band, corded at each edge, lies flat against the crown. A wide quill follows the curve of the brim, on which it is posed flat. Two flat bows of ribbon, one near the front and one over the quill, carry out the severely tailored effect that is in keeping with the shape.

Dresden Bird Capes.

Among the new and novel things offered for the home are the dresden bird capes. They are of white enamel, gold and silver, delicately colored flowers of the same material and are so practical as they are beautiful, for they can be washed with soap and water and will not peel or crack. They are in attractive shapes, some on tall standards that can be easily moved from place to place, some on top over a table, and others are to be hung from suitable crases. They are just the thing for sanparlors and boudoirs. They are beautiful in themselves and are an adornment to any room they may grace.

Antimonious.

"I'll never lend you another cup of sugar as long as I live," said Mrs. Gardley.

"I don't care!" snapped Mrs. Shadbury-Jones; "I'm every inch as good as you are, anyhow."

"Why, we're just as good as you are!"

"Yes, and you know it!"

Children of Babylon

By EFFIE SPOFFORTH

The boy, once back in his hall bedroom, threw himself down on the narrow bed and remained there motionless, his eyes closed. Sometimes, when he came home from the warehouse he was physical inert like this. He was only twenty-one, and the contrast between the hopes with which he had gone to the great city and actuality was harder than the physical fatigue.

He worked at eight dollars a week, packing books for Vincent & Co. publishers. With a high school education and literary aspirations, he ought to be able to do something better than that.

Well, give him a chance in the basement. Vincent had told him. "If you make good there, an opportunity may arise upstairs."

"I'll take it," the boy had answered. At half-past seven the following morning the boy went to work. He had worked there for four months. He did not know that Vincent was trying him out, that there really would be a chance for him, that, if clerical work and then if he proved efficient in a minor role, rising in literary staff of the publishing company. Vincent had had his eye on him all the while, as was his way. He had asked the foreman of the department two or three times if the boy was still there. Next month, perhaps, he would give himself a treat and offer advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman, the advertising manager, in confidence.

Of all that the boy knew nothing. He only saw himself hammering nails into packing cases, among a crowd of ignorant, and not too high-minded associates.

And often he had thought of giving up and going back to the farm, to face the sneers of the neighbors, the silent reproaches of his father, and, worst of all, his mother's pity.

Then temptation had come to him. There was a man named Dutton among the employees. Dutton had shown him friendliness, had won his confidence.

"You're a fool, boy, to look forward to a life of this sort of work," he said. "There's nothing in it for you. Take a chance and you may hit the big prize."

"Yes?" she answered, looking at him with sly approval.

"Let's go together," he said, greatly daring.

They descended the stairs together. At the street door she took his arm, and they proceeded toward the restaurant, without a word being spoken.

That was the most wonderful meal either of them had ever had. Their conversation was monosyllabic, but there was little need of words in the judgment of strange sympathy. And afterward they strolled together up and down the fit street. They paused at the theater door. Women in costly furs, accompanied by men in evening clothes, were going in.

"I'm glad I'm not among that crowd," thought the girl, and nestled closer to her young lover. Dairowa there were among them.

And the boy, utterly shashed at the thought of the temptation that had assailed him, and feeling himself wholly unworthy of the girl whose arm was still linked in his, was thankful to see Mr. Vincent on the next morning at nine and tell him of the conspiracy. "Well, you can't, it!" said the boy. "Just living, I mean."

Yes, it's great," the girl answered, and she knew then that she would have strength to withstand the temptation again at her post. SPRINGTIME DISHES.

A most crisp and refreshing salad is that of head lettuce and cucumbers with a garnish of red pepper, cut in strips. Rub the salad bowl with the cut edge of a clove of garlic, arrange the crisp leaves of lettuce, well drained, and then slices of cucumbers, sprinkled with a bit of chopped onion and pepper. Cover with French dressing made of four tablespoonfuls of olive oil, one of lemon juice and half a teaspoonful of salt.

Spanish Rice and Cheese—Cook a half cupful of rice in a quart of boiling water, drain and dash on cold water so that each grain stands out full and white. Put into a bowl a glass of currant jelly, pour over it a cupful of boiling water and stir rapidly until the jelly is dissolved. Pour over the rice and cook twenty minutes. Then take from the fire, add two cupfuls of walnuts, chopped fine, one-half cupful of cream, whipped. Arrange lettuce leaves on individual salad dishes. Put two heaping tablespoonfuls of the rice on each, and garnish with a tablespoonful of whipped cream.

Salmon Salad—Take a can of salmon, add equal measure of chopped celery, a few olives finely minced, and a scant cupful of salad dressing. Be careful of freshly grated coconut and serve on lettuce with a plain boiled dressing which has been made rich by the addition of whipped cream.

Quick Lunch Meat—Mix together one egg and two tablespoonfuls of sugar, add a cupful of sweet milk in which a teaspoonful of soda is dissolved. Melt a tablespoonful of butter and add one-half cupful of sifted flour and two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar. Bake in a shallow pan and serve slices of graham four. Heat well and take in a single loaf bread pan. This is best eaten warm.

TOOTHSOME DISHES.

For the vegetarian here are some good dishes to add to the list: Carrots With Peas—Cut carrots into thin slices and cook until tender. Scoop out the center, leaving a wellshaped receptacle to hold the seasoned peas. Dice these as a garnish on the carrots or around green leaf.

Pecan Loaf—Take half cupful of rice, cover with cold water, and let stand over night. Drain and slowly three cups of boiling water; cook until soft throughout. Add a cupful of the drained rice, and a cupful of pecan nuts, finely chopped, one cupful of cracker crumbs, one cupful of milk and one egg slightly beaten, one and a half teaspoonfuls of salt and a few dashes of pepper. Turn into a small buttered loaf pan, smooth and spread with a tablespoonful of melted butter. Bake in a moderate oven one hour and serve in a shallow platter surrounded with white sauce and carrot timbales. For the sauce use two tablespoonfuls each of flour and butter and a cupful of thin cream. When the butter is melted and bubbling hot add the flour, and when well mixed add the cream. Season with salt and a little salt and pepper.

Pea Meal—Take three cupfuls of dry bread that has been rolled and put through a sieve. Drain a can of peas well with cold water. Put in a saucepan and cover with cold water, bring to the boiling point and boil three minutes. Drain and force through a fine sieve; there should be a half cupful of pulp. Mix the crumbs and pulp, add a fourth of a cupful of chopped walnut meats, one egg slightly beaten, one tablespoonful of sugar, salt, pepper, a fourth of a cupful of melted butter and three-fourths of a cupful of milk. Then well blended form into a parallel lined bread pan, cover with buttered paper and bake forty minutes in a slow oven. Serve with tomato sauce if so desired.

TORPEDOES MOVE AT A RAPID RATE

Forty Knot Missile Probably Hit and Sunk the Lusitania.

DESCRIPTION OF THE DEVICE

Extreme Range of a Torpedo Is 4,000 Yards, but at 1,000 Yards It Is Much More Effective—Varies in Length From Fourteen to Twenty-Six Feet and Has Machinery For Guidance.

New York.—The German torpedo or torpedoes that destroyed the Lusitania were fired at a range of not more than 1,000 yards, and the torpedoes themselves probably traveled at a speed in excess of forty knots. The submarine or submarines from which the weapons were discharged were submerged not more than fifteen feet, and they had plenty of time to get the exact range before the torpedoes were discharged. Furthermore the torpedoes were of the most modern and powerful type and of the highest possible speed.

That is the opinion of many of the American officers, all of whom have closely followed the German submarine activities since the underwater war was started by the Germans several months ago.

The extreme range of a torpedo, it was explained by these officers, is about 4,000 yards, but the evidence is he had indeed that all the German submarine work is being done at short range, perhaps less than 1,000 yards. At the lesser range the speed of the torpedo is greater and the aim correspondingly more accurate. At the 4,000 yard range the speed of a modern torpedo should be between twenty-seven and thirty knots, at 2,000 yards about thirteen knots and at 2,000 yards between thirty-three and thirty-six knots. At lesser ranges the speed may vary from thirty-five to forty knots.

One of the American officers stated that in Charles W. Domville-Fife's book, entitled "Submarine Engineering of Today," there is a chapter on "The Life of a Torpedo," which describes its mechanism in simple language and in a correct way these terrible missiles of war.

"A first class battleship takes the last point of three torpedoes, but it may cost anything from $2,000,000 upward," the author writes. "You can devote ship of war, and be sure the bottom of the sea is but a few minutes if struck by a torpedo.

"The modern torpedo varies in length from fourteen to nineteen feet and weighs up to half a ton. It has an extreme range of 4,000 yards. The blunt nose or very heavy head. It is filled, the business end of the torpedo and contains the dry and wet gunpowder and the fulminate of mercury necessary for the explosion. Behind the explosive head is the air chamber to hold the compressed air by which motive power is furnished. Then come the engine, the search chamber or 'brain' of the torpedo, with complicated and marvelous mechanism for directing and controlling the machine. Next comes the rudder-room and, at the rear, the propeller.

"Every one of these little peculiarities indicated in by the torpedo is noted in the history sheet and referred to before the weapon is again fired. By this means all the mistakes can be made to be allowed for and a much more accurate aim obtained. It is the duty of the torpedo instructor to make up all the history sheets on a vessel, and he may be almost depended upon as a schoolmaster with a lot of small children to understand and correct. Sometimes, too, not often during trials, a torpedo is lost. Perhaps days afterward the target turns up, either washed ashore or towed in by some fisherman after having been their pot-boiler.

"A small chamber in the torpedo carries compressed air. This helps to shift it to the required depth after it has entered the water. This air, escaping from the chamber by means of a regulating valve, drives the engine at a high rate of speed, which is almost uniform throughout the trip from the tube to its target. The engine then two screw propellers at the tail of the torpedo. These propellers, on the same axis but in opposite direction, the object being to give stability to the weapon.

"The steering is effected by vertical rudders which keep the torpedo in the required direction, while the proper depth in the water—usually from ten to fourteen feet—is maintained by horizontal rudders. The torpedo is kept submerged by means of the balance chamber and is controlled in its steering by the wonderful instrument known as the gyroscope.

"So marvelous is its mechanism that its favorable comparison to a torpedo well aimed may be depended upon to strike within a yard or two of the spot aimed at. Briefly described, the gyroscope is a rotating wheel which automatically controls the torpedo's course.

"The method of firing a torpedo is very much like that of discharging a gun. It is ejected from a torpedo tube by compressed air. Upon reaching the water the torpedo is driven by its screws in the required direction. The missile is guided on a very ingenious invention called a 'torpedo director.' This is a little clock instrument fitted with 'sights' like a gun. When the sights are aligned on the enemy the officer in charge presses a key, and practically causes the discharge.

IN A NAVAL FIGHT

Vital Work Is Done In the Control Room of the Vessel.

THE HEART OF THE WARSHIP.

Through This Steel Cell, Deep Under the Deck, the Commander in the Conning Tower Is in Touch With Every Person and Event on Board.

When a warship sails into action her heart pulses and throbs as eager for the fray as the hearts of any of her crew. Yes, a warship has a heart. The heart of a warship is the control room, deep down under the deck, situated aft, usually abaft the second funnel.

Even on big fighting ships the heart is small. Generally it is only one feet by six, and is almost circular and evenly quiet. It is really a steel vault, entered by a door not unlike the door of a burglar-proof safe.

From floor to ceiling the walls are lined with dials, wires, gauges, electric bells, speaking tubes, switches and a great amount of other apparatus which keeps the commander in constant touch with every corner of the ship. It is the most wonderful and the most fear full room on earth or sea.

It is a fortress within a fortress, a steel cell within the steel walls of the fighting ship.

To be in the control room during action service is to feel like being in a vault with the door locked on the outside. This little compartment, which unless action comes, will keep alive as long as there is a living soul on board able to hear and answer a call.

It is there, in the control room that the commander leaves his instructions, observes and notes how the battle is going, calls the gun crews from place to place, directs the engineers, sees the whole fabric and supervises everything. If a submarine is seen in the direction is through the control room that it is reported.

A little bell rings, a voice far away speaks, "Submarine on the port bow, sir, two leagues off." In an instant the answer thrills the gun crews. "Ware submarine on the port bow, sweep's off! Ready!" The gunners have been ready for some time, and when the chief gunner has "sighted" the gun to his satisfaction bang goes a shrapnel and the enemy will not forget it in his life.

If a gun has to cease fire the order comes through the control room. If the enemy sends a shell on deck or anywhere in the warship the doctor are notified that they are wanted at that spot almost as soon as the shell have fallen. If the gun crew are dead it is from the heart of the ship that the order is given for fresh men to fill their places.

Though the captain himself is in the conning tower above, he knows through the officer in the control room just what has happened to his ship and the extent of the damage, and if the captain is killed in the conning tower or on the bridge the chief officer in the control room goes up at once to take his place.

Men are generally about six men in this little throbbing heart of the battleship, including quartermasters and junior officers.

The chief officer gives directions to the torpedo operators, the gunners, the searchlight manipulators and the others in charge of the fighting masts, if such are part of the ship's equipment. But, besides all this there are a hundred and one things to attend to during an engagement.

Every order has to be given at an instant's notice, given distinctly, done without the slightest hesitation or flurry. It is duty in the control room that one sees what the phrase "devotion to duty" really means.

Everything goes with automatic precision in the heart of a warship, and as it is the most vital spot on board special care is taken to preserve it from harm.

Part of the steady nerves required of those men, cooped up in this small room when the shells are flying around and the hull is being battered by the enemy's guns! A wrong signal might mean disaster, but the organization is so near perfection that mistakes are practically unknown.

There is no rest for the officers in the control room during a fight. They must stay at the ship's heart telegraphing and telephoning to every part of the vessel, without taking notice of the wreckage that is being heaped up on every hand. They know that when the end in turret No. 1 or turret No. 2 comes to reply to their signals something serious has happened.

They know that even when the conning tower has been smashed by shot and shell and the bridge has been swept away they must stick to their switches so long as there is an officer alive to direct operations. Not until the ship is blown up or remained are they allowed to leave that little room, and then they go down with her—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

CHANGES MADE IN THE GAME AND FISH LAWS

Action of Recent Session of the Legislature of Interest to Sportsmen

Every legislature in recent years has changed the game and fish laws in various ways and the lawmaking body of 1915 was no exception in this regard. Although the recommendations of State Game Warden Oates were not followed in every particular his suggestions were accepted in many instances and it is claimed that the general game laws have been somewhat improved.

Senator Odell's bill makes a number of changes in connection with the laws relative to inland fishing. This act had for its purpose the consolidation of all laws relating to fishing in inland waters into one general act and to repeal all other laws whether local or general in conflict with the Odell bill.

The general laws brought under the provisions of the Odell act includes the law which regulates the size, number and manner of taking brook trout and other species of trout from the inland streams. It also takes in the general law permitting the taking of certain kinds of fish through the ice during the months of December, January, February and March and covers the general law prohibiting the use of certain kinds of apparatus in taking fish from the inland waters of this state. The general law relative to the protection of game is made a part of the Odell bill. The act becomes effective Aug. 20.

Some New Features.

Among the new features it provides that a hook and line shall be construed to be a single line and single hook or hooks attached while held in the hand under immediate control.

The brook trout season is changed to from May 1 to Sept. 1, whereas the old law permitted the taking of trout until Sept. 15. It does not change the number or size of trout that may be taken from the inland streams but provides that all trout found in the inland waters shall be construed to be brook trout without regard to the scientific name or technical description of the species.

The season, number and size of black bass have not been changed, but the law provides that hereafter no person can have in his possession any black bass at a time when the taking of them is prohibited.

Spears, Nets and Lines

It provides that suckers, mullet, redhorse and grass pike may be taken with spear or dipnet in the inland streams during the months of March and April in each year. No artificial light, however, can be used in connection with spearing. The new law prohibits the use of all kinds of set lines, except that five lines, to be termed "tow lines" may be used for the purpose of taking all kinds of fish except brook trout and bass through the ice during the months of January and February of each year. The use of ferrets, guinea pigs and other rodents for the purpose of taking rabbits is prohibited except by farmers on their own land.

Assessor Law Amended

The hunter's license law for all kinds of game animals and birds, except deer and beaver, was amended and hereafter any person above the age of seventeen years, except farmers and their minor children while hunting on their own farms, will be obliged to obtain a license in order to hunt or trap in this state. County clerks, their deputies and others to be appointed to handle hunters licenses may receive 10 per cent of the amount collected.

A law was also passed that provides that no person shall fish for pearls, clams or mussels before securing a license. The residence license fee is $1 and nonresidents will be required to pay $5. Operation of this nature are prohibited during March, April and May.

Hereafter the deer hunting licenses will be distributed by the state game warden and a permit to ship one deer out of the state will be printed on the back of the nonresidents license coupon. A self-sealing metal tag will be supplied with each hunting license, which must be attached to the carcass as soon as it is killed. The metal tag will bear the same number as the license with which it is issued and will be a means of identification in case the deer is lost and will also prevent persons killing deer and hanging them in the woods until they have a chance to sell them.

IS THE BIBLE AN EASY BOOK TO UNDERSTAND?

Some folks say yes, and these same people always read the Bible. But in 2 Peter, 3:16 we read: "The ordinal man perceiveth not the things that are of the spirit of God." (1 Cor. 2, 14.) How the Bible we read: "The ordinal man perceiveth not the things that are of the spirit of God." (1 Cor. 2, 14.) How then can he perceive the true meaning of the scriptures, which most certainly are "of the spirit of God," more especially when the same Apostle assures us that the inspired writers "speak the wisdom of God in mystery, a wisdom which is hidden." (1 Cor. 2, 7.) and therefore not readily accessible to all.

Again, St. Peter says of the epistles of St. Paul: "In which are certain things hard to understand, which the unlerned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, to their own destruction." (2 Pet. 3,16.)

The West Michigan Pike, Michigan's most distinctive highway now to be made a part of the famous Dixie highway being projected by southern road builders, connecting the Gulf Coast with the north. At the present time there is considerable controversy whether South Bend or Chicago will be made the terminal of the Dixie highway, and West Michigan Pike enthusiasts are polling for South Bend as terminal. In the interestry of the association asserts, because it would be a comparatively easy matter to have the West Michigan Pike, then appended and run the road north from the Lincoln highway now being projected from the east to the west.

A TRIP NORTH

If you seek evidence of progress in agricultural development you need not necessarily always go south or east to find it; go north, as we did Sunday afternoon, into Hayes, a township that for many years was handicapped by being an Indian reservation. The region around Susan Lake and Oyster Bay in the old days did not give much promise. But, as we said at the outset, go north now what impresses you first is "Dit" Hammond's road, up to and some distance beyond the Greensky Hill. It constitutes a part of the "West Michigan Pike." Where completed it is perfect—what more in its praise can be said.

The Greensky Hill, for three decades the terror of the road to Petoskey either in wet or dry times, has been conquered, and the precipice you formerly climbed is far above you as you skirt the hillside on an easy grade. While the grade is established, the roadway is not yet completed, but will be this summer.

Your next impression is that old Hayes is catching up fast. The improved farm acreage is increasing year by year, the rich, black soil showing itself where a few years ago was an expanse of scrub and swail. Into this moves the progressive farmer is forcing the plow. The acreage of stock fat cattle are increasing in numbers and improvement is in evidence.

Hayes is looking to the front.

THE NEW BEACH HOTEL

It is a wonderful transformation that has taken place in the Fort Dixon avenue on the bluff.

When the new Beach Hotel opens, in about two weeks, there will be made the Northern Michigan will have taken a large stride toward the standard established by Atlantic City and Coney Island. The only difference is that between the sand and water and that in Michigan is on the "fresh" side of the argument.

The new resort hotels in Northern Michigan can afford their guests the opportunity of taking a young in Lake Michigan before breakfast!

None, up to date.

And how many resort hotels in Northern Michigan have a perfect theatre under its roof,— a theatre with proscenium, dressing-rooms, and every other accessory of a first-class place of amusement? The Beach Hotel has this. It has the first passenger elevator in any hotel in Northern Michigan, and it has a lift of its own.

The dining-room of the Beach Hotel, with its elegantly tiled floor, and large expanse of Lake Michigan views, is unquestionably the finest of all on lake fresh water.

The beautiful oak finish in the big office,—with a perfect postoffice affording look-boxes to the guests—rivals any hotel lobby between Detroit rapids and the arctic ocean.

The great expanse of porches facing the big lake; the bathing beach upon which the surf sings the song of peace and comfort, is but a few steps from made dressing-rooms, and constitutes, really, a part of the hotel, is a feature that has no rival.

The big new Beach Hotel will be ready for its guests on the—June 15th.

SHIPPING EGGS BY MAIL

So much trouble is being experienced in shipping eggs by parcel post that the poultry department of the Michigan Agriculture College has compiled a set of instructions for distribution among the farmers of this state.

The main points brought out are: Eggs will be accepted for local delivery when packed in a basket or container such that other mail matter will not be damaged. The rate for them is five cents for the first pound and one cent for each pound additional. Eggs will be accepted for mailing regardless of distance, when each egg is wrapped completely with excelsior or other suitable material and packed in a container made of corrugated pasteboard, metal or wood. Such parcels must be labeled "Eggs." The maximum weight of a dozen eggs is about one and one-half pounds so that the proper postage can be easily estimated.

PRESIDING JUDGE

Work of Judges Will Be Apportioned Among Circuits By The New Official

Judge Howard Wisset of the Ingham county circuit court, probably will be the first presiding circuit judge of Michigan with full directory power in the matter of circuits among the judges of the state.

Under the terms of the Foster bill, passed by the last legislature and approved by Governor Ferris, the Michigan circuit judges will meet in Lansing on the second Thursday of next November to designate the first presiding judge. The presiding jurist will have authority to name any of the judges in the state to go to the aid of any circuit that is overburdened with work.

One real effect of the bill will be that the judges of the small districts will receive substantial salary boosts. The bill provides that the circuit into which they are sent to do extra work shall pay them for the amount of time they serve. The judges of the small circuits will undoubtedly be once designated to help out in the larger circuits, as in Wayne county where the calendar is always overcrowded, and consequently there will go the extra pay. The salary of the judges in Wayne county is $8,000. In Wayne county there are 37 judges, each of the latter getting $7,000. There are now thirty-nine judicial circuits in the state with forty-nine circuit judges.

Election of Judge Wisset of Lansing as the first presiding judge is believed certain, inasmuch as it was he who suggested the Foster bill.

AN ENJOYABLE SURPRISE

About thirty friends of Mr. and Mrs. Kelizer, of Michigan avenue, surprised them at their home on Wednesday evening last. It was a potluck affair, but it really amounted to a banquet.

The evening was most enjoyably spent. W. J. Kimber, on behalf of the party, presented Mr. and Mrs. Kellner with a beautiful electric reading lamp, in a happy talk. Mrs. Harry Nichols and Mrs. W. E. Hampton tossed the bride, while Miss Chamberlain, in a comic graceful style, toasted the groom. Harry Nichols, evidently being in doubt as to the legality of the precious marriage ceremony, again united the couple for better or for worse.

Cards and dancing followed.

County Normal Notes

BESSIE I. ALLEN

Miss Eva Cram visited the normal room one day last week. Miss Cram graduated from the normal in 1911; she is now a successful teacher and she gave us a very interesting talk about her work.

Marcia Lamiman substituted for Miss Mannon in the north ward school Monday and Tuesday forenoon.

Thursday afternoon the class tested and scored some samples of seed corn with fairly good results.

Gladys Wolaman substituted in the south ward school Monday forenoon during the absence of Miss Hanshew.

Mrs. E. J. Chellis, of Petoskey, called at the normal Wednesday forenoon.

The class has now taken up the work in sewing and baskets which it finds very interesting.

Letters were received last week from Miss Mary Ann and Miss Mabel Dunlop. Both are teaching near Boyne Falls and are planning on taking work at the Mt. Pleasant normal this summer.

THE Y. M. C. A. SUMMER CAMP

The third annual Y. M. C. A. Summer Camp is to be held on Pinehurst Point near Horton Bay unless the County Y. M. C. A. committee reverses the action of the Advisory Committee which met in Charlevoix on Tuesday of this week to consider matters pertaining to the 1915 camp. Camp will open on Tuesday, June 22nd, and close on Friday, July 2nd. The usual fee of $5.00, one dollar to be paid at the time of enrollment, will be charged all campers and all enrollments must be in the hands of the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. on or before June 15th. To be eligible for camp boys must be twelve years of age and not over fifteen. The $5.00 fee covers all expense except transportation and each camper is expected to furnish his own bedding and table ware.

"Hit or miss" camping has no standing in association work. Just camping is not the object of this Y. M. C. A. activity. Purposeful camping is what Young Men's Christian Association is interested in and for this reason every arrangement is made to make sure that the camp will have a constructive influence, morally, mentally and physically, on every lad attending. In the form of a memorial to Mr. Ford, at the very lowest possible cost, the county commissioners of this county and the people of the county who cannot find it possible to get away for a camping trip with their sons, can be sure that the mothers as well, can be sure that their boys will be as well cared for in an ideal environment as they would be at home.

From the sounding of the rising call in the morning until every lad is in his blankets at night adult supervision is at hand to supervise the camp activities. His friends are always in camp and swimming and boating are only permitted when adult supervision is at hand. Parents who are interested in the matter and would like the opinion of parents whose sons have been in camp will, upon request, be furnished with references by the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. and the secretary will be glad to visit personally any parents who desire further information regarding the camp.

ANNUAL MICHIGAN CONGREGATIONAL CONFERENCE

Rev. and Mrs. C. E. Taggart were in Traverse City last week to attend a session upon the 76th annual meeting of the Michigan Congregational Conference. The meeting was one of unusual interest from the opening address of the Moderator, Rev. Jno. E. W. Bishop, of Grand Rapids, to the close on Thursday evening when the church was packed with the members of the Conference and the citizens of Traverse City, who came to hear the Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, ex-president Ex-Governor, Hon. Chase S. Osborne.

The reports of the year's work showed a gratifying advance over any recent year in the history of the Conference. There was a decided gain in church membership, in missionary contributions in Sunday school and Christian Endeavor membership, and in the receipts of the State Treasurer for general expenses.

Rev. H. A. Putnam, formerly of this city, was re-elected President of the Home Missionary Society. The next meeting will be held at Ishpeming.

Otto Pearson who for several years has been a member of the sales force of the Grinnell Bros. Music House at Traverse City, has been transferred to Petoskey and will have charge of the Grinnell Bros. business in that territory.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

Going Shopping

SAY! Did you ever lose your life in your right hand and go shopping with your wife?

I tried it the other day and I've been hearing voices ever since.

When I say 'shopping' I don't mean that simple everyday grind of bursting suddenly in upon the sleepy floorwalker in a delicatessen parlor and with languid elbows leaning over the remnants of a once beautiful cheese while he crudely separates four slippery herring from the bosom of a large and loving family.

No—I mean Big League shopping. I mean that kind of shopping that women go in training for two weeks in advance; high-class, expert shopping, where important money changes hands, the kind of shopping that wives look forward to with dreamy eyes and live ever after on the memories; the shopping that sweeps a man head off his feet and makes him long to be a dusky-hued postmaster in Nogales, Samoa, Salem, Islands, where the fashion in fig leaves is permanent and money is a myth.

'John,' said Peaches, the other morning, 'I want you to go to the stores with me today. I have a lot of shopping to do and you can be such a help to me because—'

'Wait a minute, friend wife,' I broke in. 'What have I done that you should wish such a calamity on me? Tell me to go out and get for my personal use an attack of inflammatory rheumatism and I'll do so; ask me to try to catch a street car at the corner of Broadway and Fifty-third Street and I'll work hard at it; put up to the time a murderous lawless climbs my front elevation and mains me for life—but don't, Oh! wife, don't ask me to go shopping with you!'

'Nonsense!' she growled. 'I can't go alone, can I? And, besides, you must help me select two new gowns at the Maison de Splash—I must have at least two, mind you! And every there we'll go to Gluksteen and Bonbittner's, where I want to get a hat. I must have something chic to take off in the theatres, mustn't I?—And then we'll spend an hour in Gorgeous Jack Brothers, where I can pick out the one of them you promised me for Christmas, and then we'll go to Camembert's for some gloved I need, and Dim—'

Help! Throw me anything! Don't you see I'm sinking?

The answer is I went—and live to prattle about it.

You know, the shopping craz brings out more prominently than anything else the fact that the price of a woman's fog is caused by living high at any cost.

The ancient Greeks had a saying, 'He spends his money like a drunken sailor.' and they evidently knew what out of a hundred today.

The majority of the hooks give and gave him the mackerel eye. There he watched to English—and killed it all except a few vowels.

'Ah! Madame,' sadly, 'a new gown, n'est pas? Something chic, Parisian, ravissant, n'est pas? I have here such sweetes. Taqdin, you! Worth, eh! Poiret, yes! Callot Soeurs, eh? Doucet, yes? This has made us wish the gimlet holes be used as eyes.

'Is that the correct lasting order for today?' I inquired politely.

'Battling orderic!' he fumbled, and then Peaches ordered me to the bench.

She turned and whispered a few encouraging words to D'Artagnan's grandfather, whereupon he began to do Pavlowa hither and thither across the room until he finally disappeared.

He is going to show us the latest creations.' Peaches explained.

'What is he? I worried. 'A French nobleman over here under cover to pick up a bit of cake money?'

'Hoopa, my dear!' I assisted, not knowing what else to say.

'Le Minaret,' continued the friend of Louis the XI. 'It would be to Madame's beauty as the rose is to a lovely garden, yes?'

He was there with the salve, that old boy

Hypnotized by the harmony of colors and carried away by the up-to-fateness of the creation, Peaches breathed in the ear of Voulevous an eager, 'How much?'

'Three hundred and forty dollaire,' he breathed back to her.

Shaking for the second time, I didn't breathe at all

'Then, with a forgiving smile, Peaches turned to me and said, 'Isn't it lovely? Isn't it wonderful?'

'Ah! Madame,' sadly, 'she's a quaint little package of pepper—that's what she is! I thought I liked that blonde, but it was only a passing fancy. This brunet has me limping after her along the Road of Happiness. Did you give the smile she saved up for you and me alone? She must burn scetylene in both lamps, because I'm all lit up with excitement. A queen, take it from an expert—a queen!'

Exit Le Minaret hurriedly, while Voulevous stood there expiating astonishment with both shoulders and the small of his back.

'Does Madame prefer something else, yes?' he wigwagged, after nothing how high in the air Peaches was wearing her chin.

'Yes,' I bolted in quickly; 'bring on something silly in a transparent skirt.'

Curtain.

When I came to I was out on the sidewalk listening to Section VI., Paragraph IV. of the Blue Act.

The time pointed her nose at the North Star and left me flat.

Peaches will probably speak to me again some time before Christmas. She'll have to if she believes in Santa Claus.

HOW ONE MAN GOT HIS START

Ambition to Be Author Not Successful, But It Served a Good Purpose in the End.

"I got my start in life," said a wealthy retired hardware dealer, "in a singular manner.

"You might not think it, I having passed the major portion of my life in selling nails, padlocks, stoves and shovels, but in my early youth my great ambition was to be a writer, an author. I had no doubt whatever that that was what I was cut out for, and certainly I worked at it good and hard; but none of the publishers seemed to agree with me. As fast as I sent the things in to them they would send them back.

"But that didn't worry me. I knew that sooner or later they would come to my way of thinking and buy it. What got my goat was the expense. I was a very busy writer and I wrote long pieces. The stamps I had to use to send these pieces out and get them back cost me a lot of money.

"When I realized how much I was paying out for stamps I said to my self, Humph! I'll save up that money for five years and then I'll go in writing again.' And for the next five years I did just as nearly the amount I would otherwise have spent for stamps, and you would be surprised if I should tell you how much it amounted to. But at the end of that time I did not again take up writing.

"I put at that time the senior partner in the hardware store in our town and I and his heirs drew out all his interest in the firm. There was a chance for a man with a little capital to get into a good business. I had the capital, my accumulated stamp money, and I bought that interest in the hardware store.

So it's back to that shopping proposition with friend wife.

Our first port of call was the Maison de Splash, where they trim a piano cover with a lace curtain and call it a creation.

It certainly was a gorgeous cozy corner, that place! The walls were decorated in soft, harmonious shades and the floor had an Alfalfa carpet so a woman could faint wherever she happened to be standing when cold the price of the particular gown she had picked to wit.

In the mountains D'Artagnan's grandfather was spiraling French cretonne in all directions until I turned to Voulevous and whispered, 'Ask him how much.'

'Of course not,' she posted. 'He is Mons Voulevous, the Proprietor of the Maison de Splash—a recognized authority on women's dress.'

Enter Mislem Voulevous, alias D'Artagnan's grandfather, a little bent, dazzlingly followed by Clara Panatella, blonde and aged of it.

'Madame!' friend wife came back.

'Oui!' chimed in D'Artagnan's grandfather. 'You see what it is—French!'

The Paris Matin publishes the picture of a gentleman with something in his head that at first sight looks like a diver's helmet, and at the second like a cupola in reinforced concrete, with a couple of 16-inch guns protruding. What it really is, is a French officer wearing the new trench helmet, steel and nickel, mask, which there is quite serious question of adopting for officers and noncommissioned officers whose duties as observers compel them at times to raise their heads above the protection of the trenches. These observer proposals should the face and neck of their wearers, and by a simple, but very ingenious mechanism, the field glasses which are fixed to the helmet can be focused by cords manipulated from beneath. Thus the chance of injuries to the hands—also distracting to frenzied in this sort of work—is completely obviated.

Famous Walkers.

The record for one-mile walk seems to have been made by E. H. Goldthwaite, a Canadian, on June 4, 1910, in six minutes, twenty-five and four-fifth seconds. H. V. L. Ross, an Englishman, walked fifteen miles in one hour and fifty-nine minutes, and T. Griffith, also an Englishman, walked twenty miles in two hours and forty-seven minutes. C. A. Schofield of England, on May 20, 1911, walked twenty-five miles in three hours and thirty-seven minutes. A few other walking records are 100 miles, 24 32 sh, by Dan O'Leary, at Chicago, in 1875; 200 miles in 46 48 32 sh; 131 miles in 144 hours, by George Littlewood in a six-day race, England, in 1882. In six days, twelve hours per day, Joe Scott of England, 1884, walked 323 miles.

He Couldn't Lose.

A lady in Los Angeles decided whether she would bring divorce proceedings or not by betting her sister. Some of the eggs were hard and some soft. If she drew a hard one she was to sue. If her egg was soft she was to remain unhappy and married. She drew the hard egg. Any husband who was given an even break like that with an egg and a divorce ought to be glad to abide by the consequences. He would win if he lost—and he did.

THE SANDMAN IN STORY

By Mrs. F. A. Walker

PERSEVERANCE.

One morning before Snowball went to the city with his master he called Midnight to him in the barn and pointed out a hole.

'I want you to sit right here in front of this hole,' he said, 'and watch for mice. If you catch one you will have your dinner, and if you do not, it will not matter, as you had a good breakfast and cannot be very hungry at dinner time.

'Mice are very quick in their movements, and you will have to keep your eyes open every minute and you will have to stay here and not run about. And if you do not catch one in a few minutes, that is not a sign there are not any mice about.'

Midnight sat down in front of the hole. 'Will I have to stay here long?' he asked.

'Until you catch a mouse,' Snowball replied. 'And you know your eyes open every minute and you will learn to catch them if you do not watch closely.'

Snowball rode away with his master and Midnight watched the hole.

After a while Kit and Puff came into the barn. 'Come over here,' said Puff and sit in the sun.'

'No, answered Midnight, 'I have to watch this hole and catch a mouse.'

'You can see just as well from here,' said Kit, 'and we want you to tell us more about the city cats.'

'Snowball told me to sit here,' Midnight replied. 'He said I would never learn to catch mice if I did not watch carefully.'

'You may not catch one if you do watch,' said Puff. 'Come over here and be comfortable.' But Midnight remembered what Snowball had said to him and remained in front of the hole, for he was very grateful to Snowball for all his kindness, and wished to please him.

By and by it was dinner time and Kit and Puff started toward the house.

'Are you going to sit there all day?' asked Kit.

'Until I catch a mouse,' replied Midnight, looking with longing eyes toward the kitchen door, where he knew a nice dinner was waiting for him. 'Are you going without your dinner?' asked Puff. 'Just because Snowball told you to watch that hole? Come along, you must be hungry.'

But Midnight could not be tempted and watched the hole with anxious eyes, but no mice were to be seen.

Puff and Kit came back from their dinner and tried to get him to walk home to a comfy bed, but Midnight still refused to leave and remained and watched the hole.

It was sunset when Snowball returned. He ran to the barn, and there sat Midnight beside the hole. 'You have not caught a single mouse,' he told Snowball, 'and I have watched the hole every minute, as you told me to do.'

'I did not expect that you would catch one,' snowball replied, 'for this is a dreary hole, but I wanted to see if you would persevere in spite of being in a quality cat and possess, and I wanted to teach you use it.

'Now, come with me, and I will see that you have a nice supper, and tomorrow I will show you a place where there are plenty of mice, and I want to see if you can work as well as watch.'

Kit and Puff came along last them. 'Did you catch a mouse at last?' they asked.

'No,' answered Midnight.

'Did you watch the hole?', said Kit, 'and you lost your dinner for nothing.'

'No,' said Snowball, 'he did not lose it for nothing; he learned a lesson that will be of more value to him in the world, and he will not give up hunting for mice and go to sleep in a basket just because he does not catch a mouse the first time he tries.'

ORIGIN OF OUR FAIRY TALES

Bluebeard and Cinderella Are Translations From French—"Babes in Wood" is English.

Some of the most popular of the fairy tales told in childhood—"Bluebeard" and "Cinderella," for instance—are translations from the French. "Puss in Boots" came from Italy, "Jack and the Beanstalk" is German, "Jack the Giant Killer" originated with the old Norwegian sagas, while "Aladdin" and "Sinbad" came from the "Arabian Nights."

"The fables in the Wood, however, is a purely English story, being in fact a popular perversion of the murder of the young princes in the tower. "Little Red Riding Hood, too is English, though its exact origin is uncertain.

"Hoopa, my dear!" I assisted, not knowing what else to say.

Hypnotized by the harmony of colors and carried away by the up-to-fateness of the creation, Peaches breathed in the ear of Voulevous an eager, "How much?"

'Three hundred and forty dollaire,' he breathed back to her.

Shaking for the second time, I didn't breathe at all

'Then, with a forgiving smile, Peaches turned to me and said, 'Isn't it lovely? Isn't it wonderful?'

'Ah! Madame,' sadly, 'she's a quaint little package of pepper—that's what she is! I thought I liked that blonde, but it was only a passing fancy. This brunet has me limping after her along the Road of Happiness. Did you give the smile she saved up for you and me alone? She must burn acetylene in both lamps, because I'm all lit up with excitement. A queen, take it from an expert—a queen!'

Exit Le Minaret hurriedly, while Voulevous stood there expiating astonishment with both shoulders and the small of his back.

'Does Madame prefer something else, yes?' he wigwagged, after nothing how high in the air Peaches was wearing her chin.

'Yes,' I bolted in quickly; 'bring on something silly in a transparent skirt.'

Peaches will probably speak to me again some time before Christmas. She'll have to if she believes in Santa Claus.

BOY'S PLEASURE AND PROFIT

No Part of Farming More Fascinating to Average Youth Than the Care of Poultry Flock.

(BY KATHARINE ATHERTON GRIMSON.)

There is no part of farming more fascinating to the average boy than the care of poultry. At the same time, there is no branch that offers him a better chance of success. Even a very small boy can establish a small flock of chickens successfully.

It does not cost much to get started—another item in favor of the poultry business. The equipment need not cost much, and, in fact, most of the needed coops and fixtures can be built by almost any ambitious boy with very little expenditure outside of his own work. Then a small outlay for eggs or a trifle larger one for stock, and he is ready for business.

There are several ways of starting a flock. The best plan is the one that best suits the pocket, the circumstances and the time of year. The cheapest way is, of course, to begin with a sitting of eggs, or perhaps two or three, and work up gradually from that.

It is a common saying that "there is more in the feed than in the breed." This is very true, for any breed, poorly fed and cared for, will be sure to give good returns, if the strain is good. And right here is where the caution should come in. In buying fowls for the flock, do not be satisfied with anything but pure-blooded fowls.

Nearly everyone has some preference of size, color or other qualities, and there are none of the standard breeds but want have more to recommend them. So if you wish to keep Brown Leghorns or buff Orpingtons, or Black Minorcas, you will be perfectly safe in doing so, no matter what someone else may say in favor of other breeds. But when once you have adopted a particular kind, stick to it.

When you are selecting your fowls, don't buy nothing but good, young birds. Throw out all the old hens that have seen their best days.

Before you try to pick out your fowls, study up well on the characteristics of the breed you have chosen. If the hens are to weigh five pounds, you need expect no chicks quite pretty near to that weight.

Read everything you can on the poultry question that you can get hold of. Do not be afraid of being called a "chicken crazy" or "hen granny." When people want good stock, they always go to some "chicken crazy" to get it. It is a good advertisement for a farmer's business to show that you are wholly interested in it.

Watch your flock. Experience is what counts most in managing a flock of your hens. They will soon learn to know you, and there are no four pets, or more profitable ones, than ten or a dozen handsome hens.

The well-kept flock of hens means a steady income—enough to keep you spending money while you are waiting for your crops to grow. That one thing alone is sufficient to justify keeping as a suitable "side line" for the boy farmer.

SCHOOLS AND SHOPS JOINED

New York City Firms Pay Pupils While Working and Learning Under Cooperative Plan.

New York city is undertaking an experiment in cooperative schooling as part of a broad plan of industrial training, according to the New York Evening Post. The board of education has cooperation with a number of manufacturing concerns and aims of the high schools is arranging for students in pairs to alternate one week in the shops of these concerns and one week at school. The following industries are already represented in the plan: machine shops, die casting shops, motor car concerns, railroad companies, real estate offices, electric light and power companies, the drafting room of a large vehicle company and the publishing business. Negotiations classes have also been started.

Those various manufacturing establishments have been cooperating in the experiment during the last few weeks, and others are preparing to take up the work in the fall. Some of others have expressed a willingness to take it up when industrial conditions improve. The number of pupils participating in the first two weeks is 156, one high school having six pairs, another nine another seven and another five. Boys and girls will be organized week by week.

Under the cooperative plan the students are paid while at work. At the close of each week the pairs meet and arrange for the continuation of their studies and work in the shops. There is no "vacation" in the sense that they are a complete course to in process of formation.

Something Doing.

"Does Johnny like his new school?" inquired the friend of the family.

"Oh, immensely," replied Johnny's long suffering mother. "He has had a fight every day since he started, and acquired a black eye that is the envy of every boy in the neighborhood."

"Yes, I know, Mr. Tarter."

"I never beat around the bush. When I get ready to ask my first wife for her heart and hand I did not waste five minutes in coming to the point."

"Oh, Mr. Tarter, but don't be too sudden. Give me time to get started."

"Mrs. Simpleton, I have called this evening to ask you a question."

"Yes; but—but—but—"

"And I want a plain, plump answer—either 'yes' or 'No.'"

"Its awfully sudden, Mr. Tarter, but I'll try to do—"

"I have known you three months."

"Yes."

"I don't think I'm mistaken in your character."

"Oh, Mr. Tarter!"

"Now, then, I am to be married to Jennie Jackson tomorrow. Do you want a position as housekeeper?"

When she revived and sat up he had vanished, and, though she reached out with her fingers for his hair, they clutched nothing but emptiness.

Dog Hero Saves Little Girl.

Little Elsie Perry, daughter of C. L. Perry of Wilson, N. C., was saved from the fangs of a rabid dog by the bravery of a nondescript dog, the property of Mr. Perry, and the constant companion of little Elsie.

While playing in front of her home the little girl was attacked by a large dog, which came running down the street. The playmate, much smaller than the attacking dog, threw himself on it, and battled grimly, until the little girl escaped into he house. The canine hero was terribly bitten in the encounter, and when it was learned that the strange dog had rabies, the hero had to be shot, as physicians said it was certain he would go mad. He is buried with the highest honors.

Fathoms Deep.

The boy yawned over his geography. "How deep is the ocean?" he inquired, pulling the cover of the book. "Fifteen hundred of fathoms, my son—thousands."

"Well, how much is a fathom?"

"A fathom is—er—er—are you looking at the Pacific? Well, your Uncle Ke'ziah's ag' was shipping crew in the Pacific and the pirates came out after him in the cannibals—but I'm too busy now to tell you the story. Run along to bed."

Her Objection.

"So Maude has come back from the front as a Red Cross nurse."

"Yes, indeed. She said if she did all the horrid things they wanted her to she would have been a perfect sight whenever the photographers got the papers came around. So she quit."

Useful Study.

"I see Johnson studies his arithmetic lesson faithfully every night now."

Natural Inference.

"Your cousin? Oh, I see! You are saving up your grandmother for the championship game."

COASTING FROM SKY TO SEA

WATER TANK AND TURNTABLE ON THE OROYA RAILROAD IN PERU

A HAND CAR ON THE OROYA RAILROAD

AN EARLY METHOD OF WORKING THE LAND

AN ANCIENT INCAN VILLAGE

THINK of a continuous, thrilling, terrifying swoop of 100 miles in a hand car from the top of a snow-clad mountain, over three miles high, to the shore of a tropical sea. Such an experience causes one years afterwards, merely upon thinking about it, to catch one's breath and one's heart to miss a beat or two, writes James Gordon Stuse, T. A. in the Pan-American Union.

But it is impossible, do I hear you say? Just a moment, while I quote you a few a very few, facts and figures. The Oroya railway (El Ferrocarril Central del Peru) is a monument to the genius of Henry Meiggs, an American, or rather, I should say, a United States of North America, for in the southern hemisphere the term "American" is not very definite, and we usually find ourselves indexed under "N" to distinguish us from the United States of Colombia, United Mexican States, etc. Callao, the Pacific terminus of the Oroya railway, and one of the principal ports of Peru, is six days by boat south of Panama. Lima, the "City of Kings," Peru's capital, is six miles from Callao, and is located on a broad tableland about five hundred feet above the sea. The opening of the Panama canal will undoubtedly stimulate travel to South America, and all parts of the continent Peru is wonderfully rich in natural wonders and historical background.

The Oroya railway was begun in 1869. Beginning at Callao it climbs steadily to an elevation of 15,665 feet above sea level, where the divide is crossed through the Galera tunnel, at sixty-ninth mile. The Morococha branch rises to elevation 15,865—the highest point reached by any railroad in the world. At Oroya, mile 132 the road divides, one branch going north to the famous Cerro de Pasco copper mines, the other 80 miles south to Huancayo, with a projected extension to Cusco, the old Inca capital, which has had not communication with the world for several years. Another branch, about three hundred miles long, is under construction down the eastern slope of the Andes to the head of navigation on the Urayali river, one of the important upper tributaries of the Amazon.

The Oroya road is not only the highest in the world, but it is most elaborately equipped with the comfortable Pullman cars and the Oroya climbs, a Hudson river train leaving New York city would have to ascend half a dozen times. It would absorb a distance 1,000 feet greater that that from sea level to the summit of Pikes Peak. The passenger train leaves Callao in the forenoon and reaches Oroya late in the afternoon. As there are no night trains on account of the great danger or rocks falling down in the track, the round trip ordinarily requires two days. Oroya is a continuous downgrade from the Galera tunnel to the sea, an opportunity to coast for the passenger train car ride in the world.

Since the courtesy of the general manager of the line we were afforded exceptional facilities for making the trip. His private car was attached to the evening train for Oroya, a fashionable resort about thirty-five miles out of Lima, at an elevation of about two thousand feet above sea level. For an hour or so we wound through a wide irrigated valley, fat and prosperous look, with plantations of sugar cane and cotton fenced in by mud walls, the roofs of a hundred showing now and then through the green. VIEW IN THE ANDES MOUNTAINS looks down on both sides of the divide. To the west is the long descent, to the east the chilly plateaus and snow valleys of the Andean treasure land.

It was now noon, and, in spite of the unaccustomed altitude, we ate a hearty Peruvian breakfast consisting of soup, salad, several meat courses, vegetables, wine, and fresh strawberries and cream. Leaving the general manager's car to be brought back by the next down train, we transferred to the hand car and pushed off. My experience of the next four hours are too kaleidoscopic for accurate or detailed description. We started amid snow and ice, bundled up in sweaters, overcoats, and blankets, and landed in lemon and orange groves four hours later! Continuously before us unrolled a grand panorama, ever changing and ever more wonderful. Where an our train had painfully toiled upward for hours, we now seemed to rush down a mile at a swoop. But two stops were made in the 100 miles, once for a section man repairing track in a tunnel and again to let the up-coming passenger train, Gulliver-like, stretch its long hard car rushed out of one black tunnel, across a swaying bridge strung over the chasm of the Rimac, and into the darkness of another tunnel out of the sheer face of the cliff. As we careened across the Infernillo bridge, one of our party aptly described his impressions as a "dash of daylight accompanied by a sinking of the heart."

In all we rushed through 47 tunnels, crossed a dozen bridges, and coasted and slowed down for eight switchbacks. The fastest kilometer coasting is reported about 45 miles an hour, and the fastest single stretch of 37 kilometers in 29 minutes (about 40 miles an hour). We are confident the steep grades and the sharp curves necessary to get a railroad through such a canyon, the fastest hand car, travel at such a speed and controlled only by a hand brake, which fails is the best evidence in the world of the excellent construction of the line and of the vigilance of the maintenance force. During our tour of South America we had many strange and interesting experiences, some of them very thrilling, but, unsofficence to compare with the hand-car coasting down the Oroya railway.

MOST POPULAR BURGLAR KILLED

"Sorry to Disturb Folks," He Said, "But I Never Harm Anyone."

ONE VICTIM MOURNS

Makes Mistake of Making Second Call at Home in Rams Night and is Killed in Skirmish With Police.

Kansas City, Mo.—That polite burglar, the late Charles E. Smith, sought to bring to his death a service of gentility and consideration that would gain and retain the good will and esteem of his clientele. But Horatio Chaffee overestimated his standing in the home of James B. Welsh, 1734 Jefferson street, when he sought to make a return call at the home the same night that he had tried and failed to rob the vault at the Hirsch hotel near by.

Several bullets narrowly missed the Revised Charles, and had Mr. Welsh's aim been a trifle straighter the career of the burglar would have ended then and there. As it was, the burglar escaped, only to be killed in a skirmish with two policemen after robbing a house at 3210 Washington street.

Details of Smith's two calls at the Welsh residence were revealed when police inspectors received a letter from Mr. Welsh, a real estate man. He was accompanied by Mrs. Welsh.

Discusses Ethics With Woman.

Mrs. Welsh had been awakened when the light of a dark lantern fell upon her face. A youthful, well modulated voice commanded her.

The voice from the vicinity of the lantern explained that the visitor was "just a burglar minding an honest thing."

Mrs. Welsh, who is corresponding secretary of the Y. W. C. A., was much interested in the young man's attitude. She asked him if he thought it right to go into other people's houses? Didn't he know that he would be imprisoned, if not killed?

"I just take the chance," said Burglar Charles. "Life is a gamble. Everywhere you hear that. I'm just a chap out of work. Of course I am sorry to disturb folks. But, on the other hand, I rob no poor man and I never harm anyone."

Mrs. Welsh sat up in bed. The burglar took a chair. A long conversation under these unusual circumstances followed. During the conversation Mrs. Welsh told the burglar that she trusted he would not go into the room occupied by her mother, a woman of eighty-five, who might be more frightened.

"I won't," he agreed.

But the burglar, perhaps by accident, found his way into that very room. Mrs. Welsh's mother awoke and fired bed.

"Are you a burglar?" the woman demanded.

"I am," the burglar replied. "And you are the lady mentioned. I just promised not to disturb you. I am sorry. You are not afraid?"

"Just so you don't do anything mean.

Sought Friendly Shelter.

The robbery over, Burglar Charles gracefully and quietly withdrew to force the woman could give an alarm.

When the robbery of the Girls hotel failed the polite burglar needed a friendly shelter. Very well, he would make another professional call to the Welsh home.

In through the same window went the burglar. Up the same stairs. With the confidence of being among friends, he got into Mr. Welsh's room.

A startled exclamation! A revolver shot! Mr. Welsh had fired.

As the burglar leaped through the front door Mr. Welsh took a second shot at him, too frustful visitor.

Mrs. Welsh told the police that she would not be sorry that Smith had been killed.

Mrs. Welsh was shown a photograph of the man who had become known to the police as "the best black burglar in Kansas City." She recognized the features.

DREAMS HE'S DEAD; SENDS FOR LAWYER

Montanan in Vision Sees Self in Coffin, Makes Will and Dies.

Butte, Mont.—A remarkable case of a dream coming true and a will being gratified as a result of his dream vision happened when Patrick Joseph Graham, a resident of this city for 35 years, died at his home on the 1st inst., Mrs. Mary Weldon. The strange story of Graham was disclosed when Attorney Louis E. Haven appeared at the courthouse to record a will filed for by Graham a few hours prior to his death.

Mr. Graham, who had been ill for several weeks, took a nap shortly before supper and dreamed that he saw himself laid out in a casket. So impressed was Graham that after supper he summoned Attorney Haven to his office and related his experience, telling him that he wanted drawn up a will. The attorney laughed and in an effort to ease Graham's mind suggested that there was no need of hurry, but this effort was unheeded and the will was drawn up, Graham leaving his property to his sister.

"I want to take no chance," said Burglar Charles. "Life is a gamble. Everywhere you hear that. I'm just a chap out of work. Of course I am sorry to disturb folks. But, on the other hand, I rob no poor man and I never harm anyone."

Mrs. Welsh sat up in bed. The burglar took a chair. A long conversation under these unusual circumstances followed. During the conversation Mrs. Welsh told the burglar that she trusted he would not go into the room occupied by her mother, a woman of eighty-five, who might be more frightened.

"I won't," he agreed.

But the burglar, perhaps by accident, found his way into that very room. Mrs. Welsh's mother awoke and fired bed.

"Are you a burglar?" the woman demanded.

"I am," the burglar replied. "And you are the lady mentioned. I just promised not to disturb you. I am sorry. You are not afraid?"

"Just so you don't do anything mean.

Sought Friendly Shelter.

The robbery over, Burglar Charles gracefully and quietly withdrew to force the woman could give an alarm.

When the robbery of the Girls hotel failed the polite burglar needed a friendly shelter. Very well, he would make another professional call to the Welsh home.

In through the same window went the burglar. Up the same stairs. With the confidence of being among friends, he got into Mr. Welsh's room.

A startled exclamation! A revolver shot! Mr. Welsh had fired.

As the burglar leaped through the front door Mr. Welsh took a second shot at him, too frustful visitor.

Mrs. Welsh told the police that she would not be sorry that Smith had been killed.

Mrs. Welsh was shown a photograph of the man who had become known to the police as "the best black burglar in Kansas City." She recognized the features.

HIS HEAD IN SHARK'S MOUTH

Black Diver Claims to Have Had Remarkable Experience With Sea Monster.

Writing in Harper's Magazine of his visit to Thursday island in the Torres strait, Norman Duncan narrates some astonishing tales of the adventures of the natives with the savage tiger-sharks of these waters.

"It is said that the coastal aborigines are not greatly afraid of a shark—that he is a match for a shark, indeed, in fair water, when not taken unaware. He may lose a leg or an arm, or he may be carried off bodily; but in any event, the damage will be due, rather to the cunning approach of the shark than to the limitations of the diver. Forewarned, he will dive to the bottom, roll the water, and blue shade the attack; and it is to pugnaciously disposed at the moment (they say)—as a general rule—of greatly interested moment—he will give fight. It is true, of course, that the beast's divers are accustomed to escape by rolling the water, and a number of accidents are common; but I have no stomach for the tale that any man will go out of his way to challenge a shark with a twenty-foot tiger-shark—even when angered by an unfriendly interruption.

"I recall two stories of narrow escape. The one concerns a young Japanese diver who was taking a crayfish to the surface, and all at once found himself in the jaws of a sh

JUDGE OUTLINES DUTY OF PARENTS

Decides Questions Asked In Thousands of Novels.

A NEW LAW IS LAID DOWN.

In Alienation Suit, Brought by Coachman Who Married Daughter of a Millionaire, Justice Hough of New York Says Love and Mammon Are Not in Any Way Associated—His Decision.

New York. — The action of Judge Charles M. Hough in the federal district court in refusing to allow the jury to consider the suit brought by Max Frederick Kistler against Mr. and Mrs. Edward E. Breitling for $250,000, charging alienation of affections, is not of great interest in itself, but in announcing his decision Justice Hough has answered questions that have been asked in tens of thousands of novels and movie plays—he has stated the relations of parents to children who are married without parental consent.

Max Kistler, the plaintiff, was once a coachman and gardener. Juliet, eighteen, is the daughter of the Breitlings. Mr. Breitling is many times a million aire and an extensive miner and ship owner. Kistler worked for a family in Michigan whose home adjoined the Breitlings' summer place. Juliet became infatuated with the good looking coachman, obtained an introduction, married him without the knowledge of her parents, wrote many endearing love notes, finally tired of him and returned to her parents.

After Kistler had been sent to one of Mr. Breitling's cabins to make his way in the world he tired of the place. Returning to New York, he attempted to regain his wife. His offers were spurned. Then followed his $250,000 suit charging alienation of affections.

After hearing the evidence Justice Hough dismissed the suit and propounded what he said was a theory of law designed to cover such cases and to minimize the scandal and discourage the institution of "such sordid demands as have been here exhibited." He held that while parental authority may terminate with marriage, the parental relation continues and that no parent is bound at the peril of a successful suit for damages to approve of his child's marriage.

"There is a duty to pursue this course because litigations like this have become almost unknown in the national courts, and no decisions of binding authority at present control the subject-matter of this suit.

"The plaintiff, in plain language sought pecuniary consolation from a wealthy father-in-law who refused to show by payments of money or the furnishing of business opportunity his appreciation of that plaintiff as a son-in-law would be out of court upon his own statement.

"All suits such as this, whether promoted by or against the rich or the poor, rest on the same legal basis—namely the altered status of the defendants in depriving the plaintiff of the society, direction and services of a wife or the protection, support and affection of a husband, as the case may be.

"But when the defendants are not strangers, but parents, the family relation, which antedated matrimony, quietly modifies the law and has produced a considerable number of opinions in all parts of the English speaking world not capable of reconciliation and furnishing help to almost any contention related to what are commonly called 'alienation suits'.

"The doctrine preferred by me and so far as I am concerned to be enforced are these: The parental authority may be admitted to terminate with the celebration of a lawful marriage by the child, and even parental power and influence (as distinguished from authority) must thereafter recognize the creation by marriage of a status protected and favored by law quite as ancient as those enforcing the duties and responsibilities of children, fathers and mothers."

SNAKE CAUSES AUTO WRECK.

Runaway Follows Owner's Effort to Kill Copperhead on Floor.

East Orange, N. J.—James Morrison of Oranges went automobiling with his family the other afternoon and when over the Second mountain drove into a side road so that his wife and two children could pick wild flowers. They left the car under a large oak tree and sauntered off.

Half an hour later Mrs. Morrison and her two children returned to the car for the return trip. Coiled up on the front seat was a large copperhead snake. The mother and children, dropping the flowers, ran away screaming.

Mr. Morrison returned to the car and, as the branches hung low over it, pushed it back to the macadam road of Eagle Rock avenue. Getting a street club from the woods, he swung at the snake, missed it and accidentally gave the car a push, and down the hill it went.

The grade was very steep, and the automobile ran through a wooden fence into the farm of Jacob Miller, striking a calf, killing a couple of chickens and finally halting after it had torn away part of Miller's back porch. By this time there was not much left of the car, and Mr. Morrison, with his wife and two children, walked four miles home. The snake escaped.

USE FOUND FOR BEAR GRASS.

Fiber Obtained From It Converted Into Coverings, Matting, Etc.

Tacoma, Wash.—Experiments conducted by the Weyerhaeuser Timber company at its plant here have resulted in the production of a fiber from the bear grass of the Pacific northwest that will be used in the manufacture of coverings, matting, etc., and it is expected that a new industry will be established in the Pacific northwest to handle the product.

The product is shipped to Chicago, where it is manufactured into rope, cordage, matting and other products. The available supply of the raw material is said to be practically inexhaustible.

Up to the time it was discovered that the leaves contain a valuable fiber herdsmen were considered pests by the ranchmen. It is now proving a source of considerable revenue to the ranchmen and to men who are employed in marketing it.

FLOOD OF IMMIGRANTS COMING AFTER THE WAR

Uncle Sam Must Be Careful to Bar the Unfit.

Washington.—Eternal vigilance is needed on the part of the immigration department to withstand the tremendous pressure of unfit immigrants trying to enter this country. Although immigration has ceased and a tremendous drop, paupers, insane, epileptic and feeble minded persons, professional beggars, those likely to become a public charge, contract laborers, those coming for immoral purposes and aliens debarred from entering this country still seem to be emigrating, though probably in smaller numbers.

Last year 33,041 individuals were refused entrance to this country, a proportion to the total number of aliens (immigrant and nonimmigrant) landing of 2.3 per cent, while for the last year ending January, 1915, 15,208 were declared, being 5.4 per cent of the total immigration during that year.

Of those trying to enter during the last six months 210 were idiots, imbeciles or feeble minded, 67 were insane or epileptic, 1,144 were suffering from tuberculosis or dangerous contagious diseases, 9,069 were likely to become a public charge, 1,705 were contract laborers, 344 were assisted aliens and 171 were coming for immoral purposes. Many people see in the fact that there is little restriction on immigration, the mentally, physically and morally unfit who are attempting to enter this country a relaxation of the weights to be expected in the near future. At the end of the war, immigration will be resumed, to absolutely and its healthy individuals, who, upon their arrival, burdens will probably induce a marked tendency toward emigration, actively encouraged by the offer of free land, apt to become a burden on the state. Such problems as far as possible will be shifted to other shoulders through a process of emigration. Only strategic regulations on the part of the American government and extraordinary efficiency in its immigration service will prevent such an unloading of the scum of the dregs of Uncle Sam.

NEW ORLEANS IS RAT PROOF.

Not a Case of Plague in City Since Oct. 4—Work Continues.

Washington.—More than half of the approximately 70,000 buildings in New Orleans have been made rat proof; there has not been a case of plague there since Oct. 4 last, and it will not be long before New Orleans will be one of the most rat proof cities in the world," announced Dr. W. C. Rucker, assistant surgeon general of the public health service. Dr. Rucker has charge of the eradication of the plague.

Reports show that 348,000 rats have been caught in the business districts in New Orleans since the anti-plague campaign began last autumn, and all of them have been subjected to bacteriological examination. "All the rats caught have been identified as to species," said Dr. Rucker. "The species Mus is important part."

Old Peppermint Remedies.

Peppermint drops have long been the unfailing comforter of old indigestion and dyspepsia. In recent times we seem to have lost most medicine some of the medicinal qualities for which peppermint oil was best in age—except in hygiene centuries. Generic in his Herbale (1633) advises the use of it either "poured into the ears with honeysuckle water or "taken inwardly" as a certain specific "against scolopendres, tarantulas, sea serpents, scorpions and the stings of mad dogs"—London Chronicle.

ARGENTINE PRIDE SCORNS BIG PROFIT

Refuses Offer of $17,500,000 For New Dreadnought Moreno.

NATIONS AT WAR WANT IT.

Greece, Peaceful, Made Largest Bid Against Many Other Countries—Acquisition of Vessel Would Have Given Her a Big Naval Advantage Over Turkey.

New York.—Argentina's patriotic pride is her new super-Dreadnought Moreno, which sailed recently from Newport News, is strong.

Not even a profit of about $6,000,000 in cash could induce the South American republic to sell this warship, one of the largest afloat, which was built at Camden, N. J. The offer was made by Greece through an agent in this city acting on instructions of the Greek minister in Paris, whose government was willing to pay $5,500,000 for the American built vessel. The cost to Argentina for the construction of the Moreno was about $12,000,000.

Greece, however, was not the only country that made bids for the immediate transfer of the warship for means very serious nations that would yet Argentina a large profit.

Italy, it is understood, is anxious to add the great six fighting machine to its navy. Although her offer was not as large as that made by the Athens government.

The first intimation that negotiations for the sale of the powerful Dreadnought Moreno, which United States warships Idaho and Mississippi for $12,000,000 and are now followed by the further offer of about $17,500,000 for the Moreno to add to her ready made navy.

Greece has also bought about 100,000 tons of coal in this country and a large quantity of hospital supplies, besides ammunition. The further fact that Greece was able to pay $12,500,000 in cash for the Moreno is made her ready made navy.

MONEY MIXUP IF AMERICA FIGHTS

Two Billions Owned by Aliens Here and In Germany.

SITUATION IS COMPLICATED

Forty-eight German Ships In American Waters Would Have to Flee or Be Seized—This Country Would Probably Give Them a Chance to Get Away and Land Where They Could.

Washington.—The precise legal status of many hundreds of millions, perhaps of billions, of property in this country and other neutral lands brought into question if the United States were to become involved in the war in Europe.

Vast properties in the United States of European ownership would be liable to confiscation.

Great properties, though much less in aggregate value, owned by Americans in Europe would be in the same peril.

American corporations would not be permitted, it is assumed, to pay dividends or interest on bonds held by citizens of the countries with which the United States was at war.

The German ships now interned in this country would be under the necessity of leaving American waters at the risk of being captured on the high seas or else being confiscated in the ports where they are now held.

In all the history of warfare there has probably never been so complicated a financial situation in international relationship as that which would exist between the United States and Germany if the two countries by any chance should engage in hostilities.

Germans have long been large investors in the United States, particularly in securities of railroad and industrial corporations. It is now pretty well known that these investments were to a considerable degree liquidated in the last year before the war began. During that period Germany was systematically turning its investments into forms most available for quick use, and the conclusion was made so strikingly and quietly that the world of business did not fully realize what was afoot until the war had actually broken out.

Consequently it is impossible at all accurately to appraise German holdings in this country today. It is believed, however, that they are largest in railroad securities, than in industrials and finally in real estate and miscellaneous forms of property.

On the other hand, American property interests in Germany are larger than is generally understood, accounts in recent years a number of American industrials have been forced to establish plants in Germany.

It was estimated that $2,000,000,000 worth of various alien owned investments in both countries would be involved if the two countries should go to war. What would be their standing?

This question is decidedly important to people on both sides who have such holdings. But it is better understood than the next one.

With the two countries at war unfavorable pressure in this country would become, before the law, "alien enemies." No matter how loyal to this country, or how determined that their conduct toward the United adopted country should be exemplary, that would be their legal position.

This class of people own great agencies of property in this country, and to involve them in any general confiscation measures would be so far-reaching in their effects that it is recognized as quite impossible that any such course be undertaken.

The declaration of war between two countries has the effect, under long established international practice, of suspending, but not wiping out, debts of a state or its citizens to the citizens of another state.

The reasons are manifest. In the first place, to pay debts to a foreign state during war would be to furnish the sinews of war to the enemy. In the second place, if the debtor declined to pay, there would be no chance to enforce collection, because the debtor, an enemy alien, would have no recourse to the country's courts to enforce payment.

The forty-eight German vessels interned in this country, appraised as worth nearly $300,000,000, are in a peculiar status. Interned here because the United States is a neutral friend, they would suddenly be found to be in the complete power of a new enemy.

It is assumed that the peculiar obligation which the United States has assumed toward these vessels questions not before broached—whether it would be violation of every special and general faith to appropriate the ships now if this country and Germany were at war.

The procedure which the authorities believe correct would be to notify the vessels that their status is changed from territorial waters and to give them a fair chance to flee. After that they would be liable to seizure by American war vessels or by the vessels of Ameri ca's allies.

Or, if the Germans preferred, they could decide to battle the United States government could take place. One of such forms of conflict the vessels and yet the whole business is set apart after the war's end.

COLOR AND MOISTURE.

There Is a Good Reason Why Vegetables Is Mostly Green.

Dentifolists many have wondered why the vegetables of the earth is mostly green. That is not what makes it green, but why it is that color instead of blue or red or purple.

Mostly, it has been found, will be colored by the green foliage in proper quantities while foliage of other colors will not be properly sustained by the dews and moisture from earth and atmosphere.

A rather curious experiment proves this.

Paint a piece of glass yellow, another green and one red and one black and place all these painted pieces of glass out in the open air over night during summer or autumn night.

When examined only the following morning it will be found that the yellow pieces will be very wet and the green piece only fairly moist, while the red and black pieces will be dry.

This is proof that yellow foliage would collect too much dampness, and the red and black would gather none. Green, which collects the medium amount of moisture, seems to be the color best adapted to the conditions existing throughout the earth.

Yellow foliage has been known to decay off and decay under the same conditions that make green foliage thrive.

A few yellow leaved plants are chosen under considerable difficulty under ordinary weather conditions.—New York Sun.

A RECORD PRESCRIPTION.

After It Was Bought and Paid For It Lost Its Charm.

The largest amount ever officially recorded in the purchase price of a prescription is 15,000 ($75,000), paid by the British parliament to a Mr. Stevens to reveal the ingredients of a secret for "general and stone in the bladder and kidney." Parliament paid this amount to satisfy the documents of the British public; also because Mr. Stevens would not take a penny less for her secret.

The ingredients so revealed by Mr. Stevens were as follows: "Egg-shells, snails (black and all), lime and hawk-weed, with celandine and various other vegetables all burned to a cinder, and the ashes mixed with camomile flowers and fennel and other vegetables."

Curiously enough, when this high priced prescription was made public it immediately lost its potency—and its popularity. New cases failed to respond to its magic, and cases which had been cured while its mysteries were still unrevealed promptly developed new symptoms. At the end of a year it was proclaimed a fraud. But, its reputation and all stands also the record of one instance in which a British parliament failed to get its money's worth.—Los Angeles Times.

Snuff Spoons.

All the world is familiar with snuff boxes, but snuff spoons are pretty little refinements of which this generation has hardly heard. Very probably they came into use about two years after Sir George Rooke's expedition to Vigo bay in 1702, when he captured half a ton of tobacco and snuff from the Spanish galleons, and snuff thus became a common article in England. One of the characters in a comedy published at Oxford in 1704, entitled "A Act at Oxford," by Thomas Baker, says: "But I carry some snuff for the ladies," to which Arabella replies: "A spoon too. That's very genteel, for in some people you thrust your fat fingers into a box is as nauseous as eating without a fork." In the latter end of fifties of the last century snuff spoons were still in use on the Scottish border. They were of bone and, of a size to go into the snuffbox. Perhaps their bowls, it was said, as naturally as they carried soup to their mouths.—London Field.

"You don't love me!" she asserted.

"I don't," he admitted.

"You are a baneful thing!" she cried. "I am," he owned.

"I believe you are trying to tease me," she said.

"I am," he conceded.

"And you do not love me."

"I don't."

For a moment she was silent.

"Well," she said at last, "I do hate a man who's such enough to be led by a woman."—Houston Post.

Optimist and Pessimist.

In a contest in the Woman's Home Companion the first prize for the definition of pessimist went to Miss D. McKeever of Cincinnati, who wrote: "A pessimist is a man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing." The first prize for the definition of optimist went to Mrs. E. P. Carter of Pennsylvania. Her definition follows: "An optimist is one who thinks the high cost of living is worth the price."

Northern Michigan

In all probability the fruit crop will not suffer in this region from frost this year, owing to the favorable location of the orchards along the water front. The southern part of the state has been visited by severe frost and it is probable that the yield of fruit will be greatly reduced. This places a great responsibility upon the fruit growers of this region during the coming season.

Central Lake Torch: Mrs. W. H. Greenman suffered a painful accident Sunday afternoon. She became dizzy while walking across the room, and fell, striking her head in such a way as to cut a deep gash in her nose. Dr. Lewis was called, and he took several stitches in the wound. Several other very painful bruises were inflicted on her head, but she is getting along nicely now.

Kik Rapids Progress: Quincy Thacker writes from Santa Ana, Calif., that while he will return to his home in Acme township his stay in his old home will be short. He will make the trip home by the two oceans and the Panama canal. Mr. Thacker's removal to the Pacific coast will be regretted by many, and the township of Acme loses one of her pioneer residents—one who has lived in the same neighborhood for more than a half century.

Twenty-eight directors attended a meeting of Western Michigan Development Bureau Wednesday in Traverse City. It was decided to devote efforts of the bureau in the direction of general farming rather than to fruit in the future. F. P. Wright of that city was hired to secure a new set of pictures and lantern slides on diversified farming for lecture lectures. The report of Secretary John I. Gibson was given showing statements from the railroads of western Michigan that since Jan. 1, 1915, there has been brought into the twenty counties a total of 951 families of farmers accompanied by 651 carloads of household goods. Finances of the bureau are in excellent condition.

Petoskey News: Dr. J. Leahy, who has been fishing at Bellaire and other points south, brought home with him Saturday several handsome specimens of German Brown trout caught at Bellaire. These were on exhibition at Bump & McCabe's store for some time and attracted considerable attention. This species of the trout family is not found in this section but in the stream about Bellaire they are said to be very numerous. The fish differs from our own brook trout in that the spots on its sides are deep brown and there are also a few red spots. The fish grows more larger than does the brook trout, some specimens weighing five or six pounds. The fish is leaner than the brook trout and is harder to land.

Petoskey News: H. H. Goodwin, of Walloon Lake, who about twenty years ago organized and for many years was secretary and general manager of the Citizens Mutual Fire Insurance company of Emmet, Charlevoix and Cheboygan counties, with offices in Petoskey, died late Saturday in Detroit, where he had been taken about three weeks ago for treatment. He was about seventy-five years of age and for many years had suffered with acute attacks of asthma. The body was brought back to his old farm home on what is known as the South arm of Walloon lake and was interred there Tuesday, May 18, the funeral being private. Mr. and Mrs. Goodwin came to Walloon about twenty eight years ago from Detroit and located on the farm. While he was engaged in the insurance business in Petoskey the farm was conducted by Mrs. Goodwin with the aid of the sons.

NAVAL GUN VIBRATION.

Conditions on a Warship When Heavy Firing Is In Progress.

The average civilian has a very vague idea as to the conditions inside a turret on a war vessel while heavy firing is going on.

The greatest force of the vibration from the firing of a gun is naturally just outside the muzzle, and that is outside the turret. So terrific is this vibration that if severe precautions were not taken the deck under the muzzle would be ripped to pieces, steel iron doors would be wrenched from their hangings and skylights shattered. To guard against these effects the deck under the gun muzzle is reinforced with steel plates about an inch thick and skylights are taken off and replaced with coverings of crude plate.

Of course a very considerable rear and jar are felt inside the turret. Men who are looking for the refinement of precaution recommend that gunners wear shoes with rubber cushioned soles and heels to lessen the jar on the deck.

The tip vibration, one either to fling in one's own or some other turret, has caused many cases of gun deafness. To stuff the ears with cotton wool is, of course, the commonest expedient followed by men and officers alike. There is also what is called the Cheatham device, consisting of a mixture of clay and wool. It is very flexible, can be molded to any ear and still allows its wearer to hear orders.

Gun deafness may come immediately as a result of a ruptured ear drum or gradually owing to an injury to the auditory nerve.—London Answers.

The Cowlick.

A so called cowlick is really not made of cows, but principally of wood. The cowlick is the modern substitute for the old horse's tail, and the limbs be made, which took the place of the dainty switch that had innumerable head, soon became famous. When any one spoons of a cowlick he is unconsciously paying a tribute to the skill of John Cork.

RURAL BILLY SUNDAY WINS.

Brings Them In With "Paint and Brush Methods."

Greencastle, Ind.—The Rev. Julius Pfeiffer, who has charge of the Patrickesburg circuit in the northwest Indiana M. E. conference, is making good. Pfeiffer is using a brush and liberal quantity of paint. He has advertised himself all over his circuit.

At the crossroads he has painted his name and the time of his meetings in big red letters, all says "balky" and "stickers" and "sinners" will not go with him as long as he is on the job.

One of his familiar pictures is: "I am on the job to stay; must see the thing through. If you want that sort of kind of preaching I am not the man to give it to you. As long as I am here I am going to talk about a big God, who has a broad humanitarian platform and who really makes folks do something."

Mr. Pfeiffer says his business is "picking up" since he started his advertising scheme, and he "expects to be running his show on full time" by June 1. He desires to "double his output" by Sept. 15.

HUNTING BURIED GOLD.

Mayoralty Aspirant Has Men Digging For Indian Treasure.

Pendleton, Ore.—H. F. Kirkpatrick, a claimant for the mayor's chair and prominent rancher, on the Umatilla Indian reservation, is using all his farm hands in an industrious search for supposed buried treasure.

The excitement was caused by Kookoyes-tash, an aged Indian woman, whose land Kirkpatrick has rented. The old woman is ill, and feeling she is about to die, she told Mr. Kirkpatrick that about nineteen years ago she buried a large quantity of gold in a tin can near her tepee.

She said she buried it about two feet deep, leaving a string attached and extending to the surface of the ground so she could find it again. The string has long since rotted off, and the woman has either forgotten the exact location of the treasure or is too ill to describe the spot. All the ground within a radius of several rods of her old tepee has therefore been plowed up and scraped away, but so far no trace has been found.

When Wigs Went.

Civilization has to thank the French revolution and the subsequent wars for massive emancipation from the wig. It was partly the scarcity of flour and the war tax on hair powder that finished the powdered wig, but partly also the leveling influence of democratism. "I do not know the present generation by sight," wrote Walpole in 1791, complaining that the young men "in their dirty shirts and shaggy hair have revealed nobility as much as the nobility in France have."—Chicago News.

BAPTIST CHURCH NOTES

The G. A. R. and W. R. C. services Sunday was well attended, all churches of the city were invited. Bro. Taggart, of the Congregational church, together with his people attended and assisted in the services. Many others were present. Come again friends, you are always welcome.

Many men are liberal constructionist on things religious. While I am a strict constructionist (as all Baptist are) yet I admire one who is genuine even though he be a Liberal. But the self styled broad minded fellow who is broad and liberal only when every thing goes his way soon runs through with a thinking people.

If you disagree with some people relating to religious matters, have no use for you and count you their enemy. A man who is so small as that is no man at all. Some of my best friends differ greatly with me on things religious, but that does not affect our friendship.

I am not a Catholic or a Methodist—no—far from them, and would do my best to make Baptists of them. I could do no more or less and be consistent. If I am right they are wrong, and if I am sinner I will endeavor to lend my friends aright on all things.

I believe in a man being genuine; if he is not, he is no man. Not dig dirt behind the cover to carry out his ends.

A good service at Burgess last Sunday, the faithfull are waking up out there and the Lord will do great things for them. Several of the chair when out with us in one of Mr. Brown's autos.

Next Sunday we speak at Marion on "Born Again." Let's have a good crowd as we will furnish you some special music, in connection with this the "First Premise of Christianity."

Don't fail to attend the Parlor Musical at the Millner home Friday evening. This promises to be one of the best evenings yet.

God blesses those men who do right and keeps them themselves by doing wrong.

Yours in the Master's Name,
Lloyd C. Vinyard.

The writer rode with Capt. H. L. Winters at the head of his Co. X in the Memorial Day parade at East Jordan. The company turned out about forty strong. Major M. J. Phillips, adjutant general, was at East Jordan Wednesday of this week and inspected the company officially. This is taken as evidence that the company will be mustered into the National Guard at an early date. The company is so honor to not only East Jordan, but to Charlevoix county, and they will be a credit to the brigade. The people of that town demonstrate Monday marked their down as soldiers entitled to State recognition. There is very little doubt, indeed, that the military board will soon give Co. X a better higher in the alphabet.

MEMORIAL DAY

DAY OBSERVED IN CHARLEVOIX WITH MORE THAN USUAL INTEREST

The Memorial Day program published in our last issue was carried out successfully, and fine weather prevailed.

Of course interest centered in the object for which the day's observances were instituted by Gen. John A. Logan; G. A. R. "General Order No. 11, issued more than fifty years ago, in which that great volunteer soldier dwelt upon the duty of the living to honor the memory of the soldier dead. In later days there came to us the duty of honoring the living veterans of that great struggle.

We have but few of the victorious army left with us, but as the years pass these few serve to inspire in us patriotic impulses and a higher sense of the duty we owe to the defenders of the republic.

The graves of our own loved ones are not forgotten on these days, and many floral tributes graced the beautiful expanse of Brookside on Monday.

THE TRACK MEET AT PETOSKEY

Harbor Springs was the northern Michigan interscholastic meet at Petoskey Saturday after a hot fight with Traverse City, getting 2 points. Harbor Springs used but two men, Wilson and Herrick, the former getting four firsts, one second and one third and the latter two firsts, a second and a third.

Adrian of Petoskey, broke the northern Michigan high school record in the discus with a throw of 112 feet and six inches. The scholastic finished as follows:

Harbor Springs, 38; Petoskey, 29½; Traverse City, 16; Charlevoix, 8; Gaylord, 8; Chelsea, 1½; Petoskey won the relay. Clarence Christopher of M. A. C. was referee.

AUTOMOBILE GARAGE DEAL

A. L. Hart & Son, on the 30th, took possession of the Vought garage on Antrim street, and in addition a genuine garage business, will install a complete repair shop, and keep cars for hire. A full line of Ford supplies and accessories will be kept in stock.

The building is practically fire proof, and is located central. Hart & Son, who are both practical machinists and mechanics, have an established reputation in automobile work. They promise the same prompt service that they have heretofore given.

BEAVER ISLAND MAIL CONTRACT

Last week the contract for carrying the mail between Charlevoix and St. James was awarded to Thos. Roe, of Harbor Springs.

It is the intention of Capt. Roe to keep the City of Boyne on the run until Thursday this week, when she will go to California. The Herald and Times of Gaylord sent its reporter out to the big ship last week and he indulges in a description of it. A photograph shows five men standing side by side alongside the lines and still they do not hide all of the trunk. The giant elm is to be found in section ten of Emmet township in the northeast quarter of that section. Just before the exploration party came upon it they had passed a pine stump fully 5 feet in diameter and taller than the large tree, and perfectly sound. A few rods distant on a comparatively level expanse of the forest stands the big elm. Its height was calculated and was found to be 135 feet. A steel tape was used to measure it and at a distance of four and a half feet from the ground it measured 23½ feet. The standard steel tape was then dropped and a measurement taken about the base of the tree. It was found to measure 39 feet at the base. In other words the tree is practically eight feet in diameter four and a half feet from the ground and is over eleven feet in circumference at the base.

Northern Michigan

A fire of mysterious origin destroyed the park noses at cottons Bay last Wednesday afternoon. When first discovered the flames were breaking through the roof. An alarm was quickly sounded and the work of removing the furniture and fixtures by many ready hands commenced. It was more than the building could not be saved, so all the attention was directed to the adjoining building.

The co-operative method of marketing farm produce is gaining in favor with the fruit and produce growers of Northwestern Michigan. This work has been the part of the orchard men and farmers to pull their products at a point that will show interest on their investments in addition to reasonable allowances for labor and main expenditures is becoming stronger day by day. Therefore the problems concerned with marketing get more and more attention. Co-operative effort appears to make the greatest promises at the present time, hence the great interest along this line.

The meeting of the Old Settlers' Association a year ago was held at Old Mission. The time perhaps will be the third week in June. Some of the pioneers now living will remember twenty-five or thirty years ago when Old Mission was one of the most active in this beautiful spot of the Grand Traverse region and how well they succeeded in their work. Today they are better prepared to entertain a crowd than they were a quarter of a century ago. They are already making preparations to entertain one of the largest gatherings the association has ever had and will spare no pains to make this, the nineteenth meeting, the banner year of the association.

Petoskey News: Mrs. William C. Niles, mother of ex-judge Jabez E. Niles, died Friday afternoon at her home at Walloon Lake after being in ill health for several years. She was seventy-one years of age and was one of the pioneer women of this section. Mrs. Niles came to Northern Michigan just forty years ago with her husband and family and was widely known in this section of the state. Her husband passed away a number of years ago at Walloon Lake and since his death she has been very feeble and demanded constant care. Her daughter, Miss Olive Niles, has been with her mother and gave her constant care during the past winter and spring. The son and daughter survive her. Another son, William Niles, was killed in a factory explosion in Detroit about a year ago.

Until other claimants can prove up with the undisputable evidence, we give Bingo credit for the death of bingo the possessor of the king of all Michigan trees, an elm that probably is older than civilization in the United States, possibly the oldest living thing in the United States west of the big trees of California. The Herald and Times of Gaylord sent its reporter out to the big tree, and it devotes two columns to a description of it. A photograph shows five men standing side by side alongside the lines and still they do not hide all of the trunk. The giant elm is to be found in section ten of Emmet township in the northeast quarter of that section. Just before the exploration party came upon it they had passed a pine stump fully 5 feet in diameter and taller than the large tree, and perfectly sound. She was seventy-one years of age and was one of the pioneer women of this section. Mrs. Niles came to Northern Michigan just forty years ago with her husband and family and was widely known in this section of the state. Her husband passed away a number of years ago at Walloon Lake and since his death she has been very feeble and demanded constant care. Her daughter, Miss Olive Niles, has been with her mother and gave her constant care during the past winter and spring. The son and daughter survive her. Another son, William Niles, was killed in a factory explosion in Detroit about a year ago.

MONEY MIXUP IF AMERICA FIGHTS

Two Billions Owned by Aliens Here and In Germany.

SITUATION IS COMPLICATED

Forty-eight German Ships In American Waters Would Have to Be Sold or Be Seized—This Country Would Probably Give Them a Chance to Get Away and Leave Where They Could.

Washington.—The precise legal status of many hundreds of millions, perhaps of billions, of property in this country and others would be brought into question if the United States were to become involved in the war in Europe.

Vast properties in the United States of European ownership would be liable to confiscation.

Great properties, though much less in association, belonging to citizens in Europe would be in the same position.

American corporations would not be permitted, it is assumed, to pay dividends or interest on securities held by the countries with which the United States was at war.

The German ships now interned in this country would be under the special jurisdiction of the American waters at the risk of being captured on the high seas or else being confiscated in the ports where they are now held.

In all the history of warfare there has probably never been so complicated a financial situation in international relationship as that which would exist between the United States and Germany if the two countries by any chance should engage in hostilities.

Germans have long been large investors in the United States, particularly in securities of railroad and industrial corporations. It is now pretty well known that these investments were to a considerable degree liquidated in the last year before the war began. During that period Germany was extensively turning its investments into forms most available for quick use, and the conversion was made so skillfully that the world of business generally was not fully realize what was afoot with the war had actually begun out.

Consequently it is impossible at all accurately to stipulate German holdings in this country today. It is believed, however, that they are largest in railroad securities, then in industrials and finally in real estate and miscellaneous forms of property.

On the other hand, American properties in Germany are large in size, but is generally understood, because in recent years a number of American industrials have been forced to establish plants in Germany.

It was estimated that $2,000,000,000 worth of various aliens owned investments in both countries would be involved if the two countries should go to war. What would be their standing?

This question is decidedly important to people on both sides who have such holdings. But it is easier answered than the said case.

With the two countries at war uncontrolled Germans in this country would become, before the law, "alien enemies." No matter how loyal to this country or how determined that their conduct toward and in their adopted country should be unimpeachable, that would be their legal position.

This class of people, owning great aggregates of property in this country, and to involve them in any general confiscatory measures would be as far-reaching in their effects that it is recognized as quite impossible that any such would be undertaken.

The declaration of war between two countries has the effect, under long established international practice, of suspending, but not wiping out, debts of a state or its citizens to the citizens of another state.

The reasons are manifest. In the first place, to pay debts to a foreign state during war would be to furnish the sinews of war to the enemy. In the second place, if the debtor declined to pay, there would be no chance to enforce collection, because the debtor, an enemy alien, would have no access to the country's courts to enforce payment.

The forty-eight German vessels interned in this country, aggregated at worth nearly $200,000,000, are in a peculiar status. Interned here because the United States is a neutral friend, they would seemingly be found to be in the complete power of a new enemy.

It is contended that the peculiar obligation which the United States has assumed toward them raises question not before broached—whether it would be violating a very special and unusual faith to assign their fate now to this country and Germany were at war.

The procedure which the authorities believe correct would be to detain the vessels that they must leave American territorial waters and to give them a fair chance to do so. After that they would be liable to seizure by a friendly war vessels or by the vessels of America's allies.

Or, if the Germans preferred, they could decline to leave the United States government could take possession of and formally confiscate the vessels and let the whole business be settled after the war's end.

COLOR AND MOISTURE.

There Is a Good Reason Why Vegetation Is Mostly Green.

Doubtless many have wondered why the vegetation of the earth is mostly green. That is, not what makes it green but why it is that color instead of blue or red or purple.

Moisture, it has been found, will be collected by the green foliage in proper quantities while foliage of other colors will not be properly nourished by the dew and nobodily from earth and atmosphere.

A rather curious experiment proves this.

Paint a piece of glass yellow, another green and one red and one black and place all these painted pieces of glass out in the open air over night during a summer or autumn night.

When examined early the following morning it will be found that the yellow pieces will be very wet with the green piece only fairly moist, while the red and black pieces will be dry.

This is proof that yellow foliage would collect too much dampness, and the red and black would gather none. Green, which collects the medium quantity of moisture, seems to be the color best adapted to the conditions existing throughout the earth.

Yellow foliage has been known to damp off and decay under the same conditions that make green foliage thrive.

A few yellow leaved plants are grown under considerable difficulty under ordinary weather conditions.—New York Sun.

A RECORD PRESCRIPTION.

After It Was Bought and Paid For It Lost Its Charm.

The largest amount ever officially recorded as the purchase price of a prescription is 150,000 ($25,000), paid by the British parliament to a Mrs. Stevens for a secret formula for her cure for "gravel and stone in the bladder and kidneys," rumoured to be this amount to satisfy the demands of the British public, also because Mrs. Stevens would not take a penny less for her secret.

The formula, as revealed by Mrs. Stevens were as follows: "Eggshells, snake skins and silt, hips and haws, ash keys, swine cress and various other vegetables all burned to a cinder, and the ashes mixed with camomile flowers and fennel and other vegetables."

Curiously enough, when this high priced prescription was made public it immediately lost its potency—and its popularity. New cases failed to respond to its use, and cases which had been cured while its mysteries were still unrevealed promptly developed new symptoms. At the end of a year it was practically forgotten. Only a few proved still steadfast, also the record of one instance in which a gallstone as gratuitously faded out of poor money's worth.—Los Angeles Times.

Snuff Spoons.

All the world is familiar with snuff-boxes, but snuff spoons are pretty little refinements of which the generation has hardly heard. Very probably they came into use about two years after Sir George Hooke's exposition on tobacco in 1702, when he captured half a ton of tobacco and snuff from the Spanish galleons, and snuff thus became a common article in England. One of the characters in a comedy published at Oxford in 1704, entitled "An Act at Oxford," by Thomas Baker, says, "But I carry sweet snuff for the ladies," to which Aimwell replies "A spoon too. That's very gallant, for I see some people run through the fat Dutch like a box in as nauseous as eating without a fork." In the forties and fifties of the last century and spoons were still in use on the Scottish border. They were of horn and, of a size to go into the snuffbox. People fed their noses, it was said, as naturally as they carried soup to their mouths.—London Mail.

What Could He Do?

"I hate to be constitutional," she said. "Then I won't contradict you," he returned.

"You don't love me" she asserted.

"I don't," he admitted.

"You are a hateful thing!" she cried.

"I am," he replied.

"I believe you are trying to tease me," she said.

"I am," he conceded.

"And you do not love me."

"I don't."

For a moment she was silent.

"Well, she said at last, "I do hate a man who is constitutional to be led by a woman."—Houston Post.

Optimism and Pessimism.

In a contest in the Woman's Home Companion the first prize for the definition of pessimist went to Miss D. McKinney of Colorado, who wrote: "A pessimist is a man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing." The first prize for the definition of optimist went to Mrs. L. K. Curtis of Pennsylvania. Her definition follows: "An optimist is one who thinks the high cost of living is worth the price."

Discussion Suspended.

"What became of that good roads movement that seemed to be quite a strong out this way?"

"It died of dust and dirt. The mud got so deep that we couldn't do the traveling necessary to attend the meetings."—Washington Star.

The Only Way.

"Jones has figured out a scheme to avoid paying real estate tax."

"Let's have it."

"Sell the property."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"Yes. His father's in the rubber business."—Baltimore American.

Whole Family Dependent

Mr. F. Williams, Hamilton, Ohio, writes: "Our whole family depend on Pine Tar Honey." Maybe someone in your family has a severe cold—perhaps it is the baby. The original Dr. Bell's Pine-Tar-Honey is an ever ready remedy—it gives immediate relief. Pine-Tar-Honey penetrates the linings of the Throat and Lungs, destroys the germs and allows Nature to act. Northern Michigan

In all probability the fruit crop will not suffer in this region from frost this year, owing to the favorable location of the orchards along the water front. The southern part of the state has been visited by severe frost and it is probable that the yield of fruit will be greatly reduced. This places a great responsibility upon the fruit growers of this region during the coming season.

Central Lake Torch: Mrs. W. H. Greesman suffered a painful accident Sunday afternoon. She became dizzy while walking across the room, and fell, striking her head in such a way as to cut a deep gash in her nose. Dr. Lewis was called, and he took several stitches in the wound. Several other very painful bruises were inflicted on her head, but she is getting along nicely now.

Elk Rapids Progress: Quincy Thacker writes from Santa Ana, Calif., that while he will return to his home in Acme township his stay in his old home will be short. He will make the trip home by the two oceans and the Panama canal. Mr. Thacker's removal to the Pacific coast will be regretted by many, and the township of Acme loses one of her pioneer residents—one who has lived in the same neighborhood for more than a half century.

Twenty-eight directors attended a meeting of Western Michigan Development Bureau Wednesday in Traverse City. It was decided to devote efforts of the bureau in the direction of general farming, rather than to fruit in the future. F. P. Wright of that city was hired to secure a new set of pictures and lantern slides on diversified farming for various lectures. The report of Secretary John I. Gibson was given showing statements from the railroads of western Michigan that since Jan. 1, 1915, there has been brought into the twenty counties a total of 951 families of farmers accompanied by 651 carloads of household goods. Finances of the bureau are in excellent condition.

Petoskey News: Dr. J. Leahy, who has been fishing at Bellaire and other points south, brought home with him Saturday several handsome specimens of German Brown trout caught at Bellaire. These were on exhibition at Bump & McCabe's store for some time and attracted considerable attention. This species of the trout family is not found in this section but in the stream about Bellaire they are said to be very numerous. The fish differs from our own brook trout in that the spots on the sides are deep brown and there are also a few red spots. The fish grows much larger than does the brook trout, some specimens weighing five or six pounds. The fish is gamer than the brook trout and is harder to land.

Petoskey News: H. H. Goodwin, of Walloon Lake, who about twenty years ago organized and for many years was secretary and general manager of the Citizens' Mutual Fire Insurance company of Emmet, Charlevoix and Cheboygan counties, with offices in Petoskey, died late Saturday in Detroit, where he had been taken about three weeks ago for treatment. He was about seventy-six years of age and for many years has suffered with acute attacks of asthma. The body was brought back to his old home on the north side lake and the South arm of Walloon lake and was interred there Tuesday, May 18, the funeral being private. Mr. and Mrs. Goodwin came to Walloon about twenty eight years ago from Detroit and located on the farm. While he was engaged in the insurance business in Petoskey the farm was conducted by Mrs. Goodwin with the aid of the sons.

NAVAL GUN VIBRATION.

Conditions on a Warship When Heavy Firing Is in Progress.

The average civilian has a very vague idea as to the conditions inside a turret on a war vessel while heavy firing is going on.

The greatest force of the vibration from the firing of a gun is naturally just outside the muzzle, and that is outside the turret. So terrific is this vibration that if severe precautions were not taken the men under the muzzle would be ripped to pieces, sheet iron doors would be wrenched from their hinges and skylights shattered. To guard against these effects the deck under the gun muzzle is reinforced with steel plates about an inch thick and skylights are taken off and replaced with coverings of armor plate.

Of course a very considerable roar and flar are felt inside the turret. Men who are looking for the refinement of pyrotechnic accompanied that guns were shod with rubber cushioned soles and heels to lessen the jar on the deck.

The air vibration, due either to firing in one's own or some other turret, has caused many cases of gun deafness. To stuff the ears with cotton wool is, of course, the commonest expedient followed by men and officers alike. There is also what is called the Chaff ham device, consisting of a mixture of oil and wool. It is very flexible, can be molded to any ear and still allows its wearer to hear orders.

Gun decisions are come immediately as a result of a ruptured ear drum or gradually owing to an injury to the auditory nerve.—London Answers.

The Corkleg.

A so called cork leg is really not made of cork, but artificially of wood. The inventor of the modern artificial leg was John Cree, and the limbs he made, which took the place of the old clumsy stumps and hitching posts, were known as Cree legs, and the limbs he made were called the cork legs because of their light weight and their resilience in walking.

RURAL BILLY SUNDAY WINS.

Brings Them In With "Paint and Brush Methods."

Greencastle, Ind.—The Rev. Julius Pfeiffer, who has charge of the Putnamville circuit in the northwest Indiana M. E. conference, is making good. Pfeiffer is using a brush and liberal quantities of paint. He has advertised himself all over his circuit.

At the crossroads he has painted his name and the time of his meetings in big red letters. "I save 'haiks'" and "hickors" and "thrasts" will not go with him as long as he is on the job.

One of his familiar phrases is: "I am on the job to stay; meet me the time through. If you want fast soft taffy kind of preaching I am not the man to give it to you. As long as I am here I am going to talk about a big God, who has a broad mountainian platform and who really makes folks do something."

Mr. Pfeiffer says the business is "picking up" since he started his advertising scheme, and he "expects to be running his shore on full time" by June 1. He desires to "double his output" by Sept. 15.

HUNTING BURIED GOLD.

Mayeraity Aspirant Has Men Digging For Indian Treasure.

Pendleton, Ore.—E. F. Kirkpatrick, a claimant for the mayor's chair and prominent rancher on the Umatilla Indian reservation, is using all his farm hands in an industrious search for supposed buried treasure.

The excitement was caused by Rebecca Joseph, an aged Indian woman, whose land Kirkpatrick has rented. The old woman is ill and, fortune she is about to die, she told Mr. Kirkpatrick that about nineteen years ago she buried a large quantity of gold in a tin can near her tepee.

She said she buried it about two feet deep, leaving a string attached and extending to the surface of the ground so she could find it again. The string has long since rotted off, and the woman has either forgotten the exact location of the treasure or is too ill to describe the spot. All the ground within a radius of several rods of her old tepee has therefore been plowed up and scraped away, but so far no treasure.

When Wine Went.

Civilization has to thank the French revolution and the subsequent wars for masculine emancipation from the wig. It was partly the scarcity of flour and the war tax on hair powder that brought the powdered wig, but partly also the leveling influence of Jacobinism. "I do not know the precise epoch when it vanished," wrote Walpole in 1795, contrasting the fine young men "in their dirty shirts and shaggy hair have wooed actility as much as the nobility in France have done."—Chicago News.

BAPTIST CHURCH NOTES

The G. A. R. and W. R. C. services Sunday was well attended, all churches of the city were invited. Rev. Taggart, of the Congregational church, together with his people attended and assisted in the services. Many others were present. Come again friends, you are always welcome.

Many men are liberal constructionist on things religious. While I am a strict constructionist (as all Baptist are) yet I admire one who is genuine even though he be a Liberalist. But the self styled broad minded fellow who is broad and liberal only when every thing goes his way soon runs through with a thinking person.

If you disagree with some people religiously or politically they have no use for you and don't count their enemy. A man who is so small as that is no man at all. Some of my best friends differ greatly with me on things religious, but that does not affect our friendship.

I am not a Catholic or a Methodist—no—far from them, and would do my best to make Baptist of them. I could do no more or less and be consistent. If I am right they are wrong, and if I am sincere I will endeavor to lead my friend straight on all things.

I believe in a man being genuine; if not, to me, he is no man. Not dig dirt behind the cover to carry out his ends.

A good service at Burgess last Sunday, the folks are waking up out there and the Lord will do great things for them. Several of the choir when out with us from the Bluff, Brower and wife.

Next Sunday we speak at Marion on "Born Again." Lets have a good crowd as we will furnish you some special music in connection with this the "First Premise of Christianity."

Don't fail to attend the Father Musical at the Milner home Friday evening. This promises to be one of the best evenings yet.

God bless those men who do right and men damn themselves by doing wrong.

Yours in the Master's Name.

C. H. Whitford, who located in Charlevoix in 1874, but who has been living at Ringe, Wash. for the past eight years, is here for the summer. Mr. Whitford was a member of Cram, Whitford & Co., operators of a saw-mill at Horton's Bay for a number of years, moving to its Charlevoix, where for several years they operated at the foot of Pine Lake.

More than a score of vessels now in operation on the Great Lakes, and possibly as many as two score will be sent to the Atlantic coast for coast-wise and foreign-trade business during the season and the next, according to the belief of Detroit vessel-men. Decision of the Interstate Commerce commission that railroads and their affiliated boat lines must be divorced before December 31, 1915, is held responsible.

John L. Ashmore was born in N. Y., July 24, 1833 and died at his home in Charlevoix May 27, 1915. He was united in marriage to Pamelia E. Jenkins Mar. 26 1874 to this union 4 children were given, one son and three daughters. Mr. Ashmore came to Charlevoix Co. in 1865. He was a member of the M. E. church and the K. O. T. M. He leaves to mourn their loss besides his wife, one son Robert and three daughters Mrs. Avert Wait and Della Fuller, of Flint and Mrs. Howard Smith of Charlevoix. Mr. Ashmore was a good man for him to die was gain.

To stimulate the production of a better and larger oat crop in Michigan, officials of the Michigan Agricultural college announced that a contest open to every farmer in the state will be held this year. To the winner a gold medal will be given. Application for participation in this contest must be in before July 1. Rules for the contest provide that fields in which the oats are grown shall be ten acres or more in size; crops shall be grown from pedigreed or improved varieties of seed approved by the farm crops department of the college and shall be sufficiently free of weeds and mixtures of other varieties to be worthy of recommendation for seed purposes.

Mr. Ed. Lorch, of Boyne City, was in the city Tuesday.

The steamer City of Boyne began the daily Island schedule Monday.

Mrs. Robert Boothron, who submitted to a somewhat hazardous surgical operation last Friday is doing well.

Henry Wood is improving the Bridge street livery barn by enlarging and entirely transforming the old office into an up-to-date room.

Mrs. Nobla Depesta is re-open the Hotel Elston June 10th. The work has reached the plastering stage and a large force of men is pushing the work.

The old veterans should not have been permitted to walk to and from the cemetery Memorial Day. There are many private family automobiles that should have been tendered to them.

General manager Sam Ross is working hard on the Masonic Fair plans. The event will be pulled off the last week in August at the Masonic Temple rooms, and the various committees are co-operating with Capt. Rose to make it a stupendous success.

The steamer Illinois Saturday arrived about ten o'clock with about two hundred and fifty high school students from Traverse City, who were going to Boyne City and Charlevoix delegations which increased the crowd to fifty. The forenoon was spent by the Petoskey track team meet. It was a noisy but happy crowd.

The writer rode with Capt. H. L. Winters at the head of his Co. X in the Memorial Day parade at East Jordan. The company turned out about forty strong. Major M. J. Phillips, adjutant general, was at East Jordan Wednesday of this week and inspected the company officially. This is taken as meaning that the company will be mustered into the National Guard at an early date. The company is an honor to not only East Jordan, but to Charlevoix county, and they will be a credit to the Brigade. The promptness of their movements Monday marked them down as soldiers entitled to State recognition. There is very little doubt, indeed, that the military board will soon give Co. X a letter higher in the alphabet.

County Normal Notes

CORA B. DRIGGETT

Miss Edna Srigley, a member of the class of 1914, was a visitor of the county normal Tuesday.

The members of the normal class enjoyed their week in making relief maps of North America.

Miss Himes and the class received letters from Miss Velma LaCount, class of '14, Georgia Coggsle and Grace Tapleson.

The class found the work with the French pastel very interesting and the results were much better than expected.

Miss Olive Metcalf was a visitor at the normal room Wednesday.

Two birds, a catbird and a Carolina rail were found in the school yard. They were very useful in our study of birds.

Marie Lamiman was absent Monday morning.

The normal class observed the teaching of Miss Correll and Miss Jarvis Thursday.

The normal class day exercises will be held at the M. E. church June 2, at 9:30 p m.

MEMORIAL DAY

DAY OBSERVED IN CHARLEVOIX WITH MORE THAN USUAL INTEREST

The Memorial Day program published in our last issue was carried out successfully, and fine weather prevailed.

Of course interest centered in the object for which the day's observances were instituted by Gen. John A. Logan's G. A. R. "General Order No. 11" issued more than fifty years ago, in which that great "soldiers' friend" dwelt upon the duty of the living to honor the memory of the soldier dead. In later days there came to us the duty of honoring the living veterans of that great struggle.

We have but few of the veterans now left with us, but as the years pass these few serve to inspire in us patriotic impulses and a higher sense of the duty we owe to the defenders of the republic.

The graves of our own loved ones are not forgotten on these days, and many floral tributes graced the beautiful expanse of Brookside on Monday.

THE TRACK MEET AT PETOSKEY

Harbor Springs won the northern Michigan interscholastic meet at Petoskey Saturday after a hot fight with Harbor Springs and Petoskey. Harbor Springs used but two men, Wilson and Gidley, the former getting four firsts, one second and one third and the latter two firsts, a second and a third.

Petoskey News: Mrs. William C. Nims, mother of city clerk James E. Nims, died Friday afternoon at her home in Petoskey after a long period of ill health for several years. She was seventy-one years of age and was one of the pioneer residents of this city. Mrs. Nims came to Northern Michigan just forty years ago with her husband and family and was widely known in this section of the country. Her husband passed away a number of years ago at Walloon Lake and since his death she has been very feeble and demanded constant care. Her daughter, Miss Olive Nims, has been with her mother and gave her every care during the past winter and spring. The son and daughter survive her. Another son, William Nims, was killed in a factory explosion in Detroit about a year ago.

It is understood that there were five bidders for the contract. Further information is promised later concerning the Island boat service.

Grandma's Flirtation

By MILDRED CARTER

(Copyright, 1925, by W. G. Chapman.)

Now that I have passed my seventy-eighth birthday I like to sit on the piazza and doze in the sun on warm afternoons. I like to see the life of the village, the girls and young men passing along the sidewalk under neath Hepburton one of them will look up at me, "Hello, grandma!" they shout cheerfully, and nod.

I like it, especially in springtime, when the leaves are beginning to unfold, and nature takes on a renewal of life. It is always a miracle to me, this new opening of the buds, just the same now as when I was a girl so many years ago.

I was married at my twenty-first in the Presbyterian belief. In those days we all thought that only the elect could be saved, and that many were destined to perish everlastingly in hell fire. Then, I remember, Mr. Darwin brought out a book which told us we were nothing but monkeys, and had no souls, any more than the beasts. I was never so sure that the Darwin had'n't, and I am less sure of it now than ever; but, still, that was a period of great unrest. A lot of religious folks ceased to believe in any thing, and there was a good deal of hypocrisy in the matter of church go ing.

But of late years I have seen the change that is coming over folks again. It is coming back to the old, turning back to the old beliefs as that they are beginning to believe. They haven't got it all down so fine, about predestination and all that, mean, but they are beginning to believe as they used to. And that strikes me as the finest sort of belief—a belief in which there is a good deal of hope mixed, a belief you have to cling to—faith, I suppose.

To my mind it isn't only the opening of the heart year after year, but the opening of our hearts, too, that convinces me of a better life to come.

I don't believe any of the young people who see me nodding here in

Now suppose I had married Tom Weeks the old romance, which exists still, in spite of my seventy-eight years, continue? Or would it have been frittered away with the cares of life, the hearing and rearing of my children, the friction of things and the struggles? I think it would have been.

That seems the strange thing about life—the moment you begin to realize happiness you lose it. It all consists in the looking backward or looking forward.

Now, what an adventure life ought to be, and was, and is because of it, with the old faith coming back to us. Because I am quite sure that if it this youth in our hearts, which never dies, no matter how old we are, that is to be realized in the life to come. I am quite sure that then, at last, we shall find the happiness which we all try so hard to catch and some how miss.

Well, then, does anyone mean to tell me that my heart won't be big enough to hold both my husband and Tom, in existence where there is no marrying or giving in marriage? It seems to me that then one will have all the romance of girlhood and all the joys of being a mother and a grandmother too.

I have put this idea into words rather crudely, not being a writer; but, anyhow, that was my conclusion, and I told Tom about it. You can't imagine how pleased it made me to know that he understood.

"That is just how I have been feeling, my dear," he told me. You see, when I heard you were married Mildred seemed impossible for me. But by and by I got used to the idea that we got to be lived, and I tried to live it. My wife and I were very happy to gether, I should say, and I guess if it had been you our children would have been different souls."

"Yes," I told him. "I should be dreadfully lonesome without Fred, Ethelbert and Mark and Philip and the two boys in Los Angeles."

"We'd now see each other as well as our own," he answered.

I closed my eyes, because I wanted to think. I was casting over in my mind the different women I have known in my life to see how whether they had married the right man or the wrong man. It seemed pretty well to work itself out. And I thought of those who had never married at all, and what a load of experience there must be waiting for them in the next life.

"For my part, Tom," I said, "I would not have it any different. I am so glad I have married you—and I used to think my heart was broken."

"Poor lass," he answered, squeezing my hand, and then, I saw a couple who were passing along the street look our way and smile.

"I'll be over tomorrow about the same time," said Tom gallant as ever, taking off his hat with the sweeping gesture he used to use. I watched the gray hair and thought his cottage. How pleasant it is to be alive, I thought. And how pleasant it is to be an old woman, with all one's troubles lived through already.

STRICTLY "WHILE YOU WAIT"

Chinese Needlewomen Mend Masquerading Garments While Seated in Public Street.

In many towns of China one may have his garments mended on the street, and "while he waits." The sewing woman are to be seen on low benches on the sidewalk, mending articles of masculine attire.

The accomplishments of these street seamstresses are somewhat limited; their efforts with the needle being for the most part confined to "running." Other branches of needlework are practically unknown to them. As a consequence their efforts are better appreciated by native workmen than by foreign travelers.

They are never short of patrons among the coolies, or laborers of the natives of other districts, and, having come to the city to engage in toilsome labor, they are in need of help for them. Their wives being left at home, they are glad to avail themselves of the services of the street needlewomen. For this class of customers the skill of the itinerant sewing woman answers practically every purpose.

Generally speaking, these women are wives of laborers and laborers who live in the housecloats which line the creeks of many Chinese cities and towns, and their modiste are a great help toward the solution of the problem of maintenance in a crowded city of 1,000,000 souls.

Hunting the Elke Heron.

In "Big Swamp," the region known as the Everglades in Florida, many sections of which are still practically unexplored today, is found the rare heron commonly called the elke. Its feathers are extremely difficult to secure. During the breeding and mating season the birds congregate at various points, and as the principal tail plumes interfere with their nesting, they cast them off, which gives the hunter his chance. In order to locate these carefully hidden breeding places he climbs a tree, and from the top watches for the birds. This tree is used as a landmark a dead tree or some other object in the distance is taken him farther in his search through the intricate maze of waterways and jungled vegetation comprising the Everglades.

One-Hundred-Pound Motorcycle.

No longer is a gap between the ordinary bicycle and the modern, high power motorcycle, as a lightweight but down power machine has been developed. It is built with a sturdy frame and motor, which, though lighter than that of the average motorcycle. With this bike filled the machine weighs only 110 pounds as compared with the approximate average weight of 280 pounds for some of the larger cycle.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

John Henry On Poker Parties

SAY! did you ever take what little money you had and attend a Poker Party?

Well, in a moment of mental aberration I suggested the proposition to my wife and she fell for it, with loud screams of delight.

Poker parties would be all right if it were not for the fact that somebody has to lose. Not having an ear for music it annoys me to hear the hostess squeal.

But Peaches figured it out that she'd invite a small, congenial bunch and with a quarter limit. It would be a 50c i. e. I sigh! we could live through the evening without bloodshed.

Hep Hardy was first choice. Hep has two missions in life. One is to go to parties, and the other is saying "Good evening!" to bar-tenders.

Of course, Uncle Louis Mifflendale was invited as was also Aunt Jessica Mifflendale. These two relatives were wished on Peaches at birth—they are kin to her mother.

They are nice people, but any time they decide to go around the world for their health I'll be at the dock to see them off.

As a contribution to the kitty we invited Spud Inkypuddle and his wife, Stella.

Spud is a Wall Street broker but since the market went wrong some months ago he's been working for a living—paper hanging, I think, or may be oil's real estate.

Sybil used to be a chorus queen but she married Spud and recovered in most entirely.

Poker players, I've noticed, are divided into two classes: The Companions of the Cold Feet, and The Lithe-hearts of the Stone.

The Companions of the Cold Feet make the most money, but the Little Brothers of the Poor sing Glory Hallelujah and give an occasional secret to the seekers as they march on to the Poor House.

The first invitee was finally named by Sam. We all stayed in and after the draw I was just beginning to look cheerful when Peaches exclaimed eagerly: "Oh John, do Sixes beat Fives?"

Everybody groaned dipped up a tiny tear and the poor girl looked ready to faint.

"Sure!" I said, just to bring her back to earth.

"I do know, I like Peaches. She's a good wife and a good wife but from the heart I say she plays poker like a Welsh rabbit, which is without form and void.

Read our poker procedure is full of hushed silences and dark surprises.

From a social point of view Peaches is the best fellow that ever drew cards, but with regard to the technique of poker she is what the ancient Greeks would call a Patrick Henry.

Sam bet his quarter and Hep Hardy raised him. Peaches was next and she looked them both to my painful surprise.

The rest of us took to our parachutes and dropped and so did Hep on the next lap.

Then Sam and Peaches began to talk back and forth at each other in sharp, terse terms, all of which money and I had to sit there and watch her bone dragged to the slaughter, powerless to help her.

Every time Sam peeped she was back at him with a raise.

I could see a whole month's household expense trickling from mine in my pocket.

I tried to give Peaches the hook call to cease firing but she never once even let me notice.

Sam had nearly all his chinese set in and Peaches reached over and touched my stack for a handful.

The pot began to look like a picture entitled "Rockefeller In The Safety Deposit Vault."

Sam was breathing hard and pink spots began to appear on his jowl. His heart was "missing," like an overfed carburetor.

I could almost hear him saying over

I Could Hear Him Saying Over and Over to Himself, "This is a Sin and I Hate to Do It, but I Need the Money."

and over to himself, "This is a sin and I hate to do it, but I need the money."

Presently, however, the chips were all in, so he repeated his call called Peaches.

As he did so he threw on the table a King full of Bullets and proceeded to gather the cash receipts with eager glutton.

"Pleasant," said Peaches, ever so quietly. "Pleasant, Mr. Gibson—and look slowly! I want to keep up with you!" and with that she spread her hand out on the table—four Sixes and a Seven Spot!

These Two Relations Were Wined on Peaches at Birth.

recover from the shock. She doesn't care, anyhow, anyway, for money, than you do for your right eye.

And then, to make matters more like a political afternoon in Mexico for the Mifflendale, Hep Hardy with a diamond flush climbed the trellis work on the outskirts of Uncle Louis and gave the alarm by the gaff for twenty sawbucks.

It was a rough night at sea for the Mifflendale.

Those two members in good stand line in the ancient order of the Elm cantons of the Cold Feet had to sit there all the rest of the evening, giving the ten cloves, trying to get their coin back—which they didn't.

The mills of the gods grind slow but once in a while they grind out a Nemesis.

When the company had gone I said to Peaches, first and last, that I'd put the South Bits and she taught you the game.

"Oh," she chirped with a smile, "I just looked it up."

"Which?" I said, "the game or the Sixes?"

She hasn't answered me yet.

That was a week ago.

Anyway, I'm glad you don't belong to the companions of the Cold Feet. I said to her as I swept the tricks

Vagaries in Veils for Summertime

Whatever vagaries the midsummer may bring in the way of fads, let us hope that pretty floating veils will be included among them. Veils, short veils of light net or of supple chiffon, that will add the lightest breeze to stir or play with the stiffest wind, are too becoming and too pretty in themselves to be left out of our wardrobes. Just now the face veil of very fine, plain net, is an epic much worn with turbans or sailors, serves to keep the hair looking neat and sometimes to improve the appearance of the complexion. Unless the skin is very clear or very smooth, plain face veils should be chosen in a color or in the very finest and most inconspicuous threads and meshes in black.

Certain shades of gray and greyish blues and those colors classed as "mode" and fawn, color are found to be most becoming to mesh face veils in the finest weaves they are hardly discernible, but add very much to the complexion more than black veils. The good veil, which is being introduced with the beginning of the spring season, promises well as a veil for summer. It is more voluminous than veils of plain net figured net or even those of lace, which appeared last summer, but did not come into general use.

Two of the bordered veils, bound with a bias fold of satin are very pretty, showing a black dot loving the

Double Skirt and Braid Trimmings

When a gown outlives the ordeal of a fashion parade—where it must vie with many other scores in a beauty contest—one may be sure it possesses one or more novel features that endure distinction. These fashion parades, or shows, have become an important institution. At them the collections of new styles of those whose business it is to select are put to the test of a public scrutiny, and the fate of many a style is settled.

The gown of black taffeta, made up with black and white stripe in the same silk, which is shown in the picture given here, was duly paraded by a great New York house that launches its products and imports it at a semi annual affair of this kind. This particular costume was among those successful ones to be placed before the manners and thus destined to inspire admiration in a much broader field than that in which its first triumph was made.

The double skirt and braid trimming are well managed in its make-up. The underskirt is laid in plaits in which the white stripe lies over the black. The plaits at each side are turned toward the front and thus leave a narrow apron of black at the middle of the front. The plaiting is set on to a plain underskirt and extends to the knees.

The overdress of this plain silk is gathered to a yoke which is short at the back and front and drops to considerable additional length at each side. The lower part of the skirt under the overdress is in the shape of the yoke, fancy black silk braid is laid on over the joining and then the seams in the yoke are machine-stitched to place.

The bottom of the overdress is shortened at the front but reaches a little below the edge of the plaited skirt at the back. It is finished with a binding of silk braid.

The short, almost straight-hanging jacket has tabs bound with braid forming a coat-looking basque. Seaing and edges are piped with the silk. The sleeves are provided with turn-back cuffs of the black taffeta, overlaid with a broad strip of the striped taffeta. The neck opens in a long V at the front, with wide turnover collar at the back, which is closed into narrow revers at each side. The small bell buttons that fasten the jacket are made by covering molds with the taffeta.

It seems as if no other hat could look quite so well with this unpretentious but quaint gown as the flat "tailor" of black "fleece," with its smart brunette cockade of white and black feathers. The shoes of white kid with tips of black and black buckles are worn with this costume which deserves to be called chic.

Our French.

Professor Picasais, th. Belgian religion professor at Harvard, was paloed at a dinner in his honor, by the appiause and cheers which greeted his description of colored contrain and wrecked liage. But when it was explained to Professor Picasais that the Harvard professors and students ha' a very slight knowledge of French—he had spoken in French—his perplexity vanished, and he smiled:

"I see, he said. "Yes. It is like the accent of the South. Mr. Smith, is a southern, left to the waiter in a Paris restaurant.

DISHES PECULIAR TO SAILORS

Oddly Named Substances That Are Looked Upon as Delicacies by Men of the Sea.

"Dog's-body" is a dish peculiar to the sailing ship and the "tramp steamer." There are many other similarities of an unique a fashion, but for the most part these dishes are confined to the old "windjammer" now rapidly passing out.

"Dog's-body" and "boodle," however, are dishes still regularly seen in the quarters of the seamen and stokers, respectively. "Black pan" consists of chicken, ham and roast beef. The variety, however, comprises scraps of food from the saloon tables given to the man by the steward.

Every evening, after dinner, two of the men go aft to the galley and receive a couple of pannfuls of the delicacy which they and never other partake. All this material destined for the sailors is thrown into a salt, forecastle bucket. Each soak, wet to desert his cat, leaving it dependent upon hunting for a living.

Optimists who still believe that cat nature may be educated or restrained, suggest that bells and bright ribbon be placed on pussy so that a warning will precede her fatal spring. Others advocate that the poles or trees on which bird houses are raised should be surrounded by or wrapped in barb wire to prevent the cat from climbing up and destroying the half-grown nestlings before they can fly to safety. A thorny rose bush is advised by another humane person, but the overpresent rule thinks it much better to plant the cat at the roots of the rose bush, where he is sure in time to evolve into harmless fertilizer.

The Bird Or the Cat?

"The Bird or the Cat!" has become a scrathing subject which is now agitating the peaceful neighborhood. Bird lovers also have attempted to establish sanctuaries for their favorites. Others have been called to revise their visiting lists according to where her royal highness happened to reside.

The bird man who has found to his sorrow that any bird cat constitutes mean catastrophe even while he is taking the mangled body of the little feathered tenant, that he has worked for months to attract, from the clutches of the long-cat-looking, fluffy, four-footed murderer, will be amazed by the calcomer, who indignantly declares that while other low-bred creatures may catch birds, she knows her own high-bred darling Fluffiania is too well bred and too well fed to do such a deed.

Naturalists statistically rank the felis domestica as third in the bird-destroying agents, holding every inch of the distance between the lives of at least fifty birds a year. A game warden who assumed the chair behind the desk in one of our counties 200 miles north of Detroit, a year or two ago, expressed the opinion that it must rise to heights of four miles and upwards to clear the towering ranges of "Pussy" perched in every home in the South And arctic ocean to the northern limits of British America. As ducks and geese are the only bird whose migrations have been seen in the daytime, many telescopic observations and numerous photographs have been taken of them during flight. These observations indicate that the flight of ducks, particularly teal, are frequently reach a speed of 100 miles an hour and over. Even with the slower flying birds it is possible to cover long stretches in one night, as the flight seems to be pursued without rest "all through the night. The probable choice of night for flight is that the day may be devoted to feeding. Besides, the absence of the birds of prey, other than owls, are thus avoided. The ducks that reach this latitude in the spring are frequently very thin and poor, evidently owing to the strenuousness of their voyage.

One of the remarkable characteristics of migration is the regularity of its annual movement among the different species, often the same day each fall and spring marking the departure and arrival. The flights seem invariably to be in flocks, whether the species be gregarious or otherwise. No sooner is the destination reached than the congregating species separate either singly or in pairs. One exception to this are robins, which are congregarious in the North but invariably go in flocks in the South. Just why some birds of the same species stop in one latitude while others go farther on is not known, though probably the quantity of food supply is the determining factor. The whole subject of migration is one of the interesting phenomena in nature which has been a matter of common observation for some thousand years and yet of whose central nature we have only the scantest information.

TOMMIE'S BIRTHDAY.

Tommie wanted to go fishing, but his mother told him he must wait until someone could go with him, she could not let him go alone, and that some day very soon she would go with him and he could fish all day. But Tommie was not satisfied, and right after dinner he told his mother he was going to play with the boys. But instead of that he went to a store and bought a hook and line, then he dug worms for bait and went to a pond he knew of to fish. He baited his hook and cast it into the pond that the fish had no intention of biting that day.

Tommie soon grew tired of waiting, and thought he would go home in swimming. The water felt nice and cool and he did not notice where he was going. Suddenly he slipped and down he went, and then he was frightened, for how could he dry his clothes before it was time to go home. But he waked in the sun for a while, and by the time he reached home his outside clothes were nearly dry. He ate his supper and went to bed early. When his mother came to kiss him good-night she felt sorry for his uncomfortable which he had left on the floor, and found they were damp.

"Hey did you get so wet?"

"Oh, one of the boys turned the hose on me," Tommie replied.

"You should have told me when you first came in because you may take 'cold," said his mother. She felt of his hair and found it was quite dry, so were his shoes and stockings. And though mother did not mention it, it again she had her suspicions. The next week was Tommie's birthday, and while he was dressing that morning his mother told him she was to take him fishing, and that he would find his birthday present in the next room.

Tommie hurried to see what it was, and found an outing suit of khaki. Which he had been wishing for, and beside it a fishing rod. Tommie felt guilty, but he thanked his mother, and told her it was just what he wanted. After breakfast a large basket was packed with sandwiches and other nice things to eat, and they went to the car. When they arrived they were several of Tommie's boy friends and their mothers. Tommie looked surprised.

"Where are you going?" he asked. They laughed and said they were going with him. It was a surprise picnic for Tommie's birthday.

They had a nice ride in the car along a country road and found a fine grove. On the opposite side of the grove was a lake. They fished, and caught some, too. Then they went wading, and then such a nice dinner. What a feast made under the trees. Everybody had a good time. Tommie enjoyed it, but he felt conscience troubled him; he had disobeyed his mother and told her a wrong story. He was very sorry, and it took away all the pleasure of his birthday picnic every time he thought of it. When they reached home everybody thanked Tommie for their good time, and he felt ashamed, for it was his mother who had given him all the pleasure, and he knew he had not treated her honestly. That night when his mother said good-night, Tommie said, "Mother, I was born a wicked boy." He was crying a little. "Tell mother all about it," she said putting her arm around him. Tommie told her how he went fishing and wet his clothes, and then told her was sorry and ashamed.

His mother told him how bad she felt to have he had been untruthful, and that he had disobeyed her; that she had been very unhappy since the night he told her, for she felt then he did not get his clothes wet in swimming. She asked him if he would never to deceive her again. Tommie promised and kissed her repeatedly, happier than he had since he told the wrong story.

Expressing Individuality.

To be himself is not a different thing from being unlike everyone else. Some girls seem to feel that the only way to express their individuality is to be a little startling. As a rule, the girls who dress and talk and conduct themselves in a way to make heads turn, are not expressing their own personalities at all. The girl who is afraid to be herself, for fear she will seem different from other people, makes a more serious mistake—not quite so serious indeed—as the girl who makes a deliberate effort to be just a little differing from everyone else.—Girl's Companion.

FARM BOY'S ADVICE TO BOYS

Do Not Forget That Little Pieces of Work Are Trifles, and Trifles Make Perfection.

The farm boy must learn from the beginning to become a skillful farmer and take an interest in the work he does and the work that is going on about him

If he does some week that does not please his father he should not be scolded but, rather, encouraged and shown and helped to do the work right so he may not make the mistake the next time.

If there is a cheerful, encouraging work spoken to the boy it will help him wonderfully.

The boy should learn to do his work honestly and well and not to think this or that little piece of work too trifling to do, for the trifles make perfection.

If he will do his work well and honestly he will have a clear conscience and be happier and more contented than if he did not do it carelessly.

He will take pride in tending to stock if he is given a few of the farm animals as his own. He will feed and care for them and will take more pride than some older farmers themselves.

From one or two animals he may have quite a flock in a little time if they are well taken care of.

The boy may also take great interest in raising crops if there is a little piece of ground given him to work and cultivate. He may feed the product of his work to the animals, and will feel better than if he were feeding the products of the fields that his father cultivated.

I do not think the boy should be put too steadily at work for it will naturally become tiresome and he wants a change just as other people do.

He should be given some spare time to do what he wishes to do himself, and then when he does work he will perform it more easily.

I think the boy should go to school as much as he possibly can and should be kept at home too much, for then he will fall back in his studies and be too proud to go to school when he cannot keep up with his mates; and when he gets a man in the winter he will delight in commencing the spring work.

The boy who lives on a farm will have many fun in the winter time, boys who live in town, for he can find many sports in the winter in the country that are not known to town boys in town.

If the farm boy tries to be contented, work on the farm, and by the help of the older people will be happy he lives, become a good farmer—he will surely be contented.—Floyd Hakes, age fourteen years, Washington.

RABBIT'S LOVE AND COURAGE

Mother Pursues Snake Carrying On One of Her Young and Eventually Rescues Little Creature.

A correspondent of St. Nicholas tells the following story of a mother rabbit's love and courage:

It was a very warm day in a sea shore town, and the boys, Charlie, the uncle was playing golf where he was staying, and the little rabbit brought home a snake fully eight feet long and one inch thick at the neck. Charlie was playing along, and right behind him, was a very large snake, and the little mother-rabbit. Reaching a small cedar tree the snake, seeing that he could not conquer the rabbit, began to climb, but my uncle killed him.

"Which all this commotion the mother rabbit was frightened and ran into the woods, and as soon as uncle took out of the snake's mouth a baby rabbit, supposed to be dead, and laid it on the grass and was about to leave the little creature skinned a few times and jumped to its feet, when the mother ran from the woods and, picking up her baby in her mouth, made off to a place of safety.

The Man of God

By REV. I. H. RALSTON
Author of Bible Stories for Young People, Monthly Bible Lessons of Chicago

TEXT—Behold now, there is in this city a man of God.—Isaiah 45:14.

It is quite significant that the term "man of God" occurs about forty times in the Bible. In the Old Testament Moses, Samuel, Elijah, David and many others were so designated. In the New Testament the term applied to the young pastor Timothy, and in a letter to Timothy, the "man of God" is urged to become thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

The man of God must be born of God, a phrase which the Divine Master, as the Spirit plainly taught through Peter, at this point that many make shipwreck of their faith or doctrine, not seeing that the new birth of God is the only entrance, and forget the teaching of Jesus that some were like the children of the devil. The last thought is not complimentary to man, nor is the Bible much complimentary to the oppression of the weak by the strong, nor the thorough selfishness and sin that in most modern political competition, nor hate, class, is illustrated in the present European war. To be a man of God a man must be born of God, and believe on the Lord Jesus, and this is not a platitude.

Intercourse With God.

The man of God is a man much intercourse with God, and this must necessarily be mutual. In olden time God spoke directly to some who were known as men of God, but in these days he speaks to us by Jesus Christ, who is only made known to us through the Bible. It is inevitable, therefore, that a man of God must have of his Bible, not as an intellectual stimulus, which it would be, nor to secure the best code of ethics ever offered to man, but to fortify himself for doctrinal debate, but in order that he may know God's will. His attitude in taking up such study should be that of the little Samuel, who is spoken of in the case as the man of God, and who said, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant hearth." Man must also speak to God, and this is by prayer, about which great error is held, especially that it is a mystical and mysterious exercise that some timid souls fear to undertake. Yet to the man of God it is the most natural thing in the world. If this mutual intercourse is intimate and frequent, the man will become more and more the likeness of God, just as human beings grow more and more like each other because of intimate contact.

Man of God God's Man.

The man of God will be the representative of God, his champion. This is more intimate than a friend of God's sons and a good store of common sense. In these days, which are certainly not so much representative of God needs men in every walk of life to be men of God, and in the business world he wants men of tender conscience; in the political world men who make pledges except to himself; in the social world men and women, their aim being the tricks of social custom; in the realm of morals men who stand for purity and temperance, Sabbath-keeping, pure language and clean life. At this point the man of God must not forget that he is human. The only one to whom the Lord Jesus spoke, saying, "Why call ye me good? There is one good, God," of whom we read that "Jesus was a man. The man of God is not necessarily a man of God, because he withdraws to the mountain or desert or wilderness, or takes such a view of the world as to deem it impossible in any way to deal with Caesar or the rulers and powers ordained of God. There is no greater honor awaiting the true Christian than to compel the world to see that he is God's man. He may be a busy farmer, a mechanic, or a day laborer, a university president, the head of a great institution, or the president of the United States.

Recognition by the World.

The man of God should be recognized by the world as such. Samuel was known to Saul, in what way we do not know certainly, as the man of God. The man of God must let his light shine, but this must always be in recognition of the fact that light never makes any noise in its shining. In letting light shine there is more likelihood that the man attracts opposition rather than approbation. Some have proved that they are men of God because they have stood alone for God, and have withstood opposition against the evils that they see the world is suffering from. Daniel in Babylon, Paul in Ephesus respectively, Luther in Augsburg, Martin Luther in Germany, John Knox in Scotland, and others, were almost alone in their stand for God, but in the end the cause for which they stood triumphed.

An editor in the city of Chicago recently: "Sooner or later you will trade at the ... and then save money." Sooner or later every man will want to be a man of God, and be recognized.

WORDS IN THE MAKING.

Our Language Grows by Terms Created to Fit the Occasion.

Language can be made in the library, no doubt, and in the laboratory, and it is often then and usually effectively created in the workshop and in the market place, where the incalculable energy of our race expresses itself wonderfully in swift response to the growing need for a word to the unexpected demand. Nothing could be better, each in its own day, than such words as the sabre, the sloop, and the rifle, and how much, wholesome and how manfully, all of them American contributions to the English language and all of them examples of the purest English. Here mislead is an adjective devised by Mr. Howells to describe those people who are so common in all walks of life and who are made up of only one sin at a time and of blameless activities at all times. Scarcely less good and less quick are the products of the newspaper office, while wind jammer was put together by some down east sailor man. Inherior of the word forming elfit of his island sa venire who helped to hurry the ne made. "Windjammer," remarked Professor Gildersleeve, trained by his intimate knowledge of Greek to apprecate verbal vivor as well as verbal fitness—"windjammer is a fine word. I grant, and so is every Anglo-Saxon compound that grows and is not made."

But all new words are not of necessity good words. Ben Jonson, who was himself a frequent maker of new words, deplored the shrewdness when he declared that "custom is the most certain mistress of tirannys as the publicke stampe makes the current money," adding as a caution, "But we must not too frequent with the mint, every day coyning."—Brander Matthews in Harper's Magazine.

RUSSIA'S MIGHTY RIVER.

The Sluggish Volga in Three Times as Long as the Rhine.

In Russia the rivers are large and sluggish, owing to their great length and slight fall. The Volga is the longest river in Europe. It is 2,300 miles in length—that is three times as long as the Rhine—yet its total fall is only a little over 800 feet.

The Volga has its source in the Valdai hills, where it takes its rise, are only 700 feet above sea level, while averaging at the mouth, it still five feet below the level of the sea.

"The Russian fondly speaks and sings of it as "Matushka Volga," or "Little Mother Volga," in gratitude, no doubt, for the bountiful supply of fish, caviar and salmon, as well as comforts and pleasures afforded by this historic stream, which plays so important a part in the economic life of the nation.

"The products of Asia and Europe are carried on its waters; the two thousand odd river steamers are always busy, and the large rafts, consisting of ten of thousands of logs, being floated or pulled down the stream, represent a small portion of the riches of Russia's inexhaustible forest lands.—New York Telegram.

Where Women Swim Best.

"The Korean women are the best swimmers in the world," said a life guard. "The Korean pearl diving is in their hands. They swim—they don't boat—they swim out to the pearl beds, carrying baskets with them. After this swim of half an hour they dive down fifty feet and fetch up queer one shelled pearl oysters as big as baldes. They give all their baskets are full—the baskets are corked to keep them afloat—and after three or four hours' work they swim back home with their catch. The big one shelled oysters are valuable as pearl mussel and as food too. A half dozen Koreans will set down to an oyster as easily as you or I sit down to a broiled lobster."

NOTABLES IN THE LIMELIGHT

General Radko Dimitrieff, Russian Army Leader.

General Radko Dimitrieff, who commanded the army cross at the siege of Przemysl, was Bulgarian minister at St. Petersburg when the present war broke out. He resigned his portfolio to take service under the czar. Although one of Russia's most distinguished soldiers, General Dimitrieff has lived a great part of his life in Russia. He was born in Tsarigrad in 1856 and in 1877 was sent to Russia to complete his military education. During the war he served as a lieutenant in the Russian army. He returned home in 1879 and took part in the revolution that made Eastern Rumelia a part of Bulgaria. In the subsequent war by Serbia he was appointed chief of staff of the eastern army corps and served with gallantry.

The following year he showed his Russian sympathies by taking a leading part in the overthrow of Prince Alexander. But when a counter revolution ended in Prince Ferdinand being placed on the throne Dimitrieff was compelled to flee to Russia, where he remained until his pardon in 1888. On his return to Sofia he received a commission in the Bulgarian army and eventually became chief of staff.

In the war of 1912 against Turkey he served as commander of the first army, under the supreme command of General Michael Savoff, and won fame by his victory at Kirk Kilise, in the first battle of the war. When the war between the Balkan states broke out the following year he was made commander in chief, General Savoff declining to serve. At first he conducted a brilliant campaign, but eventually Bulgaria was compelled by exhaustion and by victory at Kirk Kilise, in the first battle of the war. When the war between the Balkan states broke out the following year he was made commander in chief, General Savoff declining to serve. EPITAPH ON STEPPING STONE Found on Slab Just Turned Over After Fifty Years.

Columbia, Conn.—Needing a flat stone for repairs that he was making, Edward Phillips piled up one which for over fifty years had been used as a stepping stone near the farmhouse back door. To his surprise he saw on the reverse side, in fairly plain letters, the inscription:

"In memory of Mary, daughter of Mr. Joseph and Mrs. Eunice Smith, who died April 9, 1811, aged six months and fifteen days.

"Rest, thou, sweet slumberer, in the peaceful grave
Short was thy life; forgotten soon shall be
Except the few who, drowned in sorrow's wave
Will ever cherish and remember thee."

Nobody knows where the stone had been, and it where it came from. Mr. Phillips' father bought the house over fifty years ago and had the stone set in the back door then for a stepping stone. It is five feet long and nearly two feet wide.

LAST SHOT OF CIVIL WAR.

Women Asked Police to See if Old Gun Was Loaded—It Was.

New York.—The "last shot of the civil war" was fired twenty-five years in courtroom. It came from a gun which had been handing for years on a wall in the home of the late Willard H. Hodgens. The musket had been carried in the war of the rebellion by Mr. Hodgens's father.

Mr. Hodgens's widow was preparing to move to another house, but was afraid to take down the old musket. She called in the nearest Children's Society of the Flatbush police station and turned the gun over to him. He took it around to the station house and showed it to Attendant Patrick O'Loughlin of the Flatbush court, which is in the same building.

Patrick in the court, O'Loughlin pointed the gun at the door and pulled the trigger. The old war musket was heard, loaded, and there was a report which startled the police reserve and the people in the court.

WANTS A NATIONAL BANK IN CANAL ZONE

Helm of Kentucky Would Go After South American Trade.

Washington.—Representative Helm of Kentucky has a plan to establish a national bank at Panama, in the Panama canal zone, with branches elsewhere in this country. He would call it the Pan-American bank and give it a capital stock of $25,000,000.

Mr. Helm introduced a bill to incorporate the Pan-American bank, and when the forty-fourth congress comes he will press it for action.

The committee group resulting from the European war has convinced every thinking man in this country that foreign trade is a vital element in our domestic prosperity and that the continents of North and South America have greater identity of interests than we ever realized before. Mr. Helm. There never was a time when opportunity was knocking so loud at our doors. The commerce and business of a continent are within our grasp. The manufacturing enterprises in Central and South America are very limited, and it is to this matter that I wish the attention of the country could be directed.

"Few, if any, of the republics to the south of us have the means of transporting or delivering their products to any country. Under existing conditions merry all the trade of Central and South America flows eastward. The Atlantic is outside to be flowing from North America to Central and South America.

"About the only means of creating commercial and business relations are banking facilities, transportation, press bureau and personnel agents. Under the federal reserve act a bank with $1,000,000 capital in the United States can establish a branch bank in any of the countries in Central or South America. This provision, in my opinion, does not go far enough. What we need is a bank of sufficient proportions and magnitude and importance and prestige to bestride the business of the continent.

"The government of the canal zone is going to be just as stable and steady as the government of the United States. It is established a bank on the canal zone it becomes identified with the locality. The government is behind it. That guarantees to Mexico and makes it a sure go. The government to the south of us would be inspired with confidence in the institution."

Girl Made a Lieutenant.

Petrograd.—Army orders contain the promotion of a young woman, Alexandra Lazerev, to lieutenant, with sixteen other girls belonging to families of Don Cossacks.

She has been fighting alongside male relatives since the beginning of the war. Eight of these have been killed, and Miss Lazerev was a prisoner, but she killed her guard and escaped and led a reconnoitering party which captured eighteen Uhlans.

Where Were the Gordons?

An old woman of the name of Gordon in the north of Scotland was listening to the account given in the morning of Belgium's plight, which was read to her by a little grandchild. When the listener came to tell of the thousand people which formed part of the Jewish sovereign's five stack. "Eh, laasie—read the 'ole woman, "the Campbells, say ye? The Campbells are, an auld clan, sure enough, but dinna ye see the Gordons too?"—Dundee Advertiser.

Envelopes.

When the envelope was first offered to the public it was looked upon with distrust in many quarters. The intendations of the new idea were greatly opposed by most of the old firms, and for few the envelope would be thrown away and all chance of posting be lost the pen of were instructed to pin the envelope to the letter. This practice was quickly abandoned, however, and "the little bags" became a prominent feature in Rowland Hill's penny system, then were not long in winning their way into popular favor.—London Express.

Turnipkes.

It was formerly the custom to obtain the funds to maintain principal thoroughfares by collecting a tax from those using them. Tolls or gates were set across the roads by the keeper or toll collector.

To prevent people who traveled hard from passing without paying the toll he was provided with a long and handled stick with a sharp iron head. This was put across as a barrier, and when the toll was paid it was turned aside to permit the carriage or wagon to pass on its way. Hence the expression which means a road on which toll was collected—Rocky Mountain News.

An American Messenger

He Carried a Dispatch In the European War.

By GEORGE T. LARNED

Mr. Delano, the ex-president, was sitting in the Cafe Royal, in London, when a messenger came to his table and handed him a dispatch. He had been in the cafe a little while, and was in a state of mind between the exhilaration of a good dinner and the depression of a good cigar. The dispatch was addressed to him at the Hotel Ritz, and he had left word there that he was to be found at the cafe if any dispatches came for him. He had left the Ritz because he was tired of being there, and had gone to the cafe because he was tired of being there. He was tired of being there because he was tired of being everywhere. He was tired of being everywhere because he was tired of himself. He was tired of himself because he was tired of his wife. He was tired of his wife because she was tired of everything. He was tired of everything because everything was tired of him. He was tired of everything because everything was tired of everything else. He was tired of everything else because everything else was tired of everything else. He was tired of everything else because everything else was tired of everything else. He was tired of everything else because everything else

CHAPTER XI—Continued.

For years Martha had discharged her duties, if mechanically yet with a sense of patience, kindness and serenity. At this moment she was at one gushing, disappointing, heart-breaking crisis of a precious, over which the slightest misstep would topple her. The world was out of joint.

"I wish we had gone to Italy," she remarked finally.

"It would not have served my purpose in the least. Besides, I have been dancing and playing bridge and going to sleep, and I should have had no time for thinking."

"Thinking!" Martha elevated her brows with an air that insisted that she greatly doubted this statement.

"Yes, thinking. It is not necessary that I should mope and shut myself up in a cell, Martha, in order to think. I have bearing enough to the end of my doubts. If that will gratify you. From now on you may rely upon one thing, to a certainty."

Martha hesitated to put the question.

"I am not going to marry Arthur. He is charming, graceful, accomplished; but I want a man. I should not be happy with him. I can twirl him too easily around my finger. I want that he occasionally over me a certain indefinable fascination; but when he is out of sight it amounts to the sum of all this definitely and doubting. It is probable that I shall make an admirable old maid. Wisdom has its disadvantages. I might be very happy with Arthur, were I not so wise." She smiled again at the reflection in the mirror. "Now, let us go and assume the natives."

There was a mild flutter of epithets, as she sat down beside Warrington and began to chatter to him in Italian. He made a brave effort at following her, but became hopelessly lost after a few minutes. Kilsa spoke fluently; Rafflin was a good second; but Warrington was a poor third. Presently he "Act as you please. There are empty chairs at the second-class table, among the sailors. And now, good-by. The happiest hours in ten long years are due to you." He took off his helmet and stepped aside for her to pass. She held out her hand, but he shook his head. "Don't make it harder for me!"

"Mr. Warrington, I am not a child!"

"No me you have been the angel of kindness; and the light in your face I shall always see. Please go now."

"Very well." A new and unaccountable pain filled her throat and forced her to carry her head high. "I can find my way back to the other deck."

CHAPTER XII.

The Game of Gossip.

During the concluding days of the voyage Kisa had her meals served on deck. She kept Martha with her constantly, pronounced only early in the morning and at night while the other passengers were at dinner. This left a clear deck. She walked quickly, her arm in Martha's, friendly propelling her along, never spoke unless spoken to, and then answered in monosyllables. Her thoughts flow to the thousand and one things, futilely and vainly. In the endeavor to shut out the portrait of the broken man. What was he doing, of what was he thinking, where would he go and what would he do? She hated night which, to rouge offering sleep, provided nothing in lieu of it, and compelled her to remain in the cabin. She was afraid.

Early Wednesday morning she roused Craig and Mallow, but the two had wit enough to step aside for her and to speak only with their eyes. Disturbed Craig with unadulterated fear. Mallow dragged along the samovar and waited for he found a chance to see Kisa at close range.

"There's a woman. Gad! that beach comber has taste."

"I tell you to look out for her," Craig warned again. "I know what I am talking about."

Mallow whistled. "Oho! You probably acted the fool. Drinking?"

Craig nodded affirmatively.

"Thought so. Even a Yokohama barmaid will flight shy of a boozer. I'm going to meet her when we get to Singapore, or my name's not Mallow."

Craig laughed with malice. "I hope you win, it will take some of his heat out of you. Say, let's go aft and bust up the chap. I understand he's taken up quarters in the second cabin."

"Doesn't want to run into me. All right; come on. We'll stir him up a little and have some fun."

They found Warrington up in the stern, sitting on the deck, surrounded by squatting Lascars, some Chinamen and a solitary white man, the chief engineer's assistant. The center of interest was Rajah, who was performing his tricks. Among these was one that he did pretty could be made to perform, the threading of beads. He displayed this art, as I certain the pulling of a blunt needle in his beak the floor it aside each time Warrington handed it to him. But ever his master patiently returned it. At length, recognizing that the affair might be prolonged indefinitely, Rajah put two beads on the thread and tossed it aside. The Lascars jabbered, the Chinamen grinned, and the chief engineer's assistant swore approvingly. The parrot shrilled and waddled back to his cage.

"Fine business for a whole man!" Warrington looked up to meet the eyes of Mallow. He took out his cutty and fired it. Otherwise he did not move nor let his gaze swerve. Mallow, towering above him, could scarcely resist the temptation to stir his enemy with the toe of his boot. His hatred for Warrington was not wholly due to his brutal treatment of him. Mallow always took pleasure in doing things under him by fear. Warrington had done his work well. He had never recognized Mallow as his employer, but in no other capacity; he had never offered to smoke a pipe with him, or to take a hand at cards or split a bottle. It had not been done by words, but in this attitude Mallow had recognized his manager's disapproval of him, a tacit assumption of superiority in birth and education. He had with sullenness submitted, shaken off the humiliation that memorable night. Week as the man had been in body, there had been no indication of weakness in spirit.

Occultly Warrington read the desire in the other's eyes. "I shouldn't do it, Mallow," he said. "I shouldn't. Nothing would please me better than to give a good excuse to chuck you over the rail. Upon a time you had the best of me. I was a sick man then. I'm in tolerable health at present."

"You crow, I could break you like a pipe stem." Mallow rammed his hands into his coat pockets, scowling contemptuously. He swigged fully twenty pounds more than Warrington.

Crow! Warrington shrugged. In the East crow is a rough synonym for thief. "You're at liberty to return to your disciples forward with that impression," he replied coolly. "When I get to Singapore," rising slowly to his height until his eyes were level with Mallow's, "when we get to Singapore, I'm going to ask you for that fifty pounds, earned in honest labor. And if I decline to pay?" truculently.

"We'll talk that over when we reach port. Now, remember, get out. There won't be any balting done today, thank you."

"Coensiorent!" jeered Mallow. Craig touched his sleeve, but he threw off his hand roughly. He was one of the best rough and tumble fighters in the Straits settlements. "You thirsty beach comber, I don't want to mess up the deck with you, but I'll cut your dumb for you when we get to port."

Warrington laughed insolently and picked up the parrot cage. "I'll bring the comb. In fact, I always carry it. Not a word to Crisa, not a glance in his direction. Warrington stepped to the compassionway and went below.

Craig could not resist grinning at Mallow's discomfiture. "Wooden breaks, eh?"

"Shut your mouth! The sneaking dock-walloper, I'll take his statistics of him when we land! Always had that lazy and mighty air. Wants to be think he's a gentleman."

"He was once, said Craig. "No use going you advice; but he's not a healthy individual to fall. I'm no kid, when it comes to scrapping; but I haven't any desire to mix things with him." The fury of the man who had given him the clashing was still vivid. He had been handled as a terrier handles a rat.

"I tell you he's yellow. And with a hundred thousand in his clothes, he'll be yellower still."

A hundred thousand. Craig frowned and gazed out to sea. He had forgotten all about the windfall. "Let's go and have a peg," he suggested surlily.

Immediately upon obtaining her rooms at Raffles hotel in Singapore Kisa bearing Martha there to await the arrival of the luggage, an imposing collection of trunks and boxes and kitbags. Kisa went down to the Japanese curiosity shop had its offices in the rear of the hotel. She walked through the outer office and stood silently at the counsel general's elbow, waiting for him to look up. She was dressed in white, and in the pugree of her helmet was the one flash of color, Rajah's blue feather. The consul general turned half-frowning. His kindly face had the settled expression of indulgent inquiry. The expression changed swiftly into one of surprise.

"Miss Chetwood!" he cried, seizing her hands. "Well, well! I am glad to see you. Good gracious what a beautiful woman you've turned out to be! Sit down, sit down!" He pushed her into a chair. "Well, well! When I saw you last you were almost a child."

"What a frightful memory you have! And I was such a fool to fall in love with the same adjective."

"Is there a better one? I'll use it if there is. You've proved just in time. I am giving a little dinner to the consuls and their wives tonight. You are, I'm an old friend from India in town today, and I've asked him, too. Your appearance evens up matters."

"Oh; then I'm just a filler-in!"

"Nonsense. I'm the most important person of the lot, though modest Kunstler."

"Colonel Knowlton!" exclaimed Elsa.

"That's so, by George! Stupid of me. You came down on the same boat. Fine! I know another fellow."

TO HIS SOUL-MATE AFFINITY

Traveling Man's Confession to His Wife Was of a Different Sort From the Ordinary.

Dear Gifts—Just in from Rocnester I am—and I am—Rochester. Not so finding a letter here from you I know you are very busy and feel lonesome job at the best, and a time from a fellow's sweetheart brightens up the whole day.

Business is nothing excitiun, owing to the season and the fact that most of you once in a while, which is most of the while.

It gets kinder lonesome around here sometimes, and I sit by the window, stick up my feet, light a cigar and dream of you—and the kids and home, and Christmas, and the Christmas dreams they are, too.

Say, I have been dreaming of an old sweetheart of mine today and was wishing I had her with me now.

She had a sweet, winsome face, deep blue eyes and wavy hair, a tall, willowy girl, just the kind to make a fellow rave over.

Don't blame me for dreaming of this last old sweetheart, for I can't help it. Confession is good for the soul, and I don't mind telling you I am dreaming of her all the time. I'm married now, but she is still my sweetheart and, what's more, she always will be for there is nothing on earth half so precious.

I'm told it isn't wise to write to one's wife concerning old sweethearts, but I must confess that the one of my dreams is really the only one I ever had; the others were merely flames. She is married now, and I'm married now and every week I drop in at her home to see her. Don't be cross at me, dear, for she is only my sweetheart.

Goodby, until Saturday.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The unusual size of some game fish caught in irrigation ditches in Washington led to the belief that they had entered themselves by eating alfalfa and an investigation proved the theory correct.

HAPPENINGS in the BIG CITIES

Climber Disturbs a Fashionable Set in Chicago

CHICAGO—The youngest set of North side society held forth on a recent afternoon in the new "million-dollar" playground at Delaware place and Lake Shore drive. Nursemaids and governesses, austere in plume, trim jether and yoy, retrieving lost tennis balls, playing backstop for amateur baseball catchers. With grace and dexterity the grandchildren of the grand dames were playing a game the intricate but more active than which—in incomparable matter—called "base ball."

Entirely surrounding the youngest set at play was a stout and high wire fence.

Thus things stood when appeared the terror of society, a climber. The climber was on the street side of the fence. With one unhuntsmanlike shoe firmly placed in the mesh of the fence a foot above the sidewalk, the climber had started to climb into society.

It was a dirty-faced and grimy-handed little climber who sought entrance to the playground—a girl of somewhere between three and four, with ragged garments thereby white stockings tumbling about her ankles and wearing a torn dress of uncertain color.

The climber was doing her best to surmount the wire fence when Joe Waltner, head attendant at the playground, arrived. He was running and evidently distressed.

Then he ran around outside the fence and asked the climber who she was and where she came from. The climber began to cry.

The climber, it seemed, was no longer a menace to the tranquility of the million-dollar playground. Waltner relented and immediately Anna found herself in real society—inside the fence, inside the Chicago athletic club, inside the Chicago athletic club, inside the Chicago athletic club, where men lived, but the climb and the elect may enter. Waltner took her there while he telephoned to the Chicago avenue police station.

Until evening Anna, climber no longer, amused herself with an endless procession of brass buttons as she was passed from one policeman to another. Then her father called for her and took her back to her home on Erie street.

San Francisco Visitors Ask About Barbary Coast

SAN FRANCISCO.—"Oh, officer, where did it come from? I mean the name Barbary Coast." Just ask that question of the first policeman you meet and then watch his squirm and "stall," for every policeman is asking the same thing of every other policeman, and of some persons who are not.

Now, the "Barbary Coast" is a name for that sector, suggestive of red lights and French restaurants, dance halls and Chinese orchestras, has long passed unquestioned with us by reason of long usage. Not so, however, with tourists and others here to see the exposition and all that goes with it. They mean to have its derivation, its history and the reason why—therefore, they pick on policemen. And anything a policeman doesn't know, he answers anyway with, "Yes, ma'am; you blocks up and turn to your right." But tourists are insistent and so policemen are trying to solve the riddle of "Barbary Coast."

"Well, now, I'll tell you, ma'am," explained one bronzed bluecoat to a determined little woman from the middle West, "I think it comes from a barber shop."

"Why, are there many barbers there?"

"No, ma'am, but they do say you're liable to get 'trimmed' if you go there."

And while a lot of similar explanations are being dispensed by our guardians of the peace, those who "know, or claim to, say that 'Barbary Coast' was saddled on San Francisco's tenderloin by seafaring men who sailed it to the real Barbary Coast of Africa, recognized as the haunt of pirates and a tough place in general. If anyone has a better explanation to offer, please tell it to a policeman, for he wants to know.

Strange Disease That Affects the Liberty Bell

PHILADELPHIA—Liberty bell, the most precious relic of the birth of this nation, is afflicted with an insidious disease of so serious a character that metallurgical experts have advised against sending it to San Francisco for exhibition at the Panama-Pacific exposition.

Liberty bell made the journey to New Orleans in 1885, to Chicago in 1893, to Charleston in 1902, to Atlanta in 1895, to Boston in 1903 and to St. Louis in 1904. But since its return from that last journey its home in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, the bell has been so badly afflicted the old bell for the last 30 years has widened and extended alarmingly which the experts have discovered. Vanderpoosh commissioner of the Missouri exposition, who is now in Philadelphia, says the disease is growing diagonally around the upper portion of the bell for more than a quarter of its circumference.

As in the case of a human patient, there has been a diagnosis and a course of treatment prescribed. The old bell's doctor is Alexander E. Outerbridge, Jr., who heads the department of metallurgy at Franklin institute, Philadelphia. In his report to the curator of the museum where the bell rests Mr. Outerbridge says:

It is no superbolical figure of speech to say that the venerated Liberty bell is afflicted with a serious disease. Some months ago we noted in their technical phraseology the term "diseases of metals, and recognize several such maladies. I myself have no hesitation in saying that the bell has a cancer and its circumference is increasing at a rapid rate. Cancer is a disease such as it would be subjected to in a long journey."

Blackwells Island Has Its Own Exclusive Set

NEW YORK.—Blackwells island has its aristocracy—its first families of the workhouse. The social register, say those who understand the life behind the bars, is identical with the prison register, for no one is the woman's wing can be recognized as "in society" unless she has attained four commitments.

Two commitments, or three leave one in the limbo of the parvenus; three evince a good round term in the penitentiary, does some distinction, plus the "climber." It takes four terms to make the aristocracy. Six is so pass master. As for neophytes, the use of the light crassmore is exceedingly hard.

Quite a few offenders recently came upon a woman in tears. "None of these girls will have a thing to do with me," she sobbed.

"What were you committed for?"

"Tenement house law, but then—oh—you see it was only the first time. Not that they respect you for that!"

They respected her it appeared, to the extent of freezing her out. No one would speak to her, talk to her, allow her to act as a picket against the honors in case some one should offer her a cigarette. Her ostracism seemed to cut as deeply as do any other social sins.

As a matter of fact, the workhouse is every an odd sort of a home—the only place where she may feel in harmony with her environment.

Why He Does Not "Ring True."

A small piece of foreign substance falls into the bell metal and will ruin the resonance and music of the bell. That is what we mean when we say that such a man does not "ring true." Such foreign substance has gone into the casting at his life.

LEARNED CHINESE TONGUE AND WAYS

That Was Why Two Young San Francisco Boys Made a Big Success.

INSPIRATION IN DOCK YARDS

Determined to Conquer the Markets of the Orient, Rosencrantz and Keegan Accomplished Their Aim in a Dozen Years.

By O'BORN MARSHALL.

(Copyright, 1915, by Joseph Kerman. They found each other when they were subcollers in San Francisco, and in spite of difference in race and tradition they both knew from the start that they were kindred spirits. Eighteen years ago they used to wander down to the docks of the port of Golden Gate and as they watched the incoming steamers rich with their oriental cargoes or laden with bamazas from Tahiti, they would dream of the spirit of adventure and achievement that was wafted in with each breath of sea air.

"The very bilge water of those Pacific liners," says Mr. Keegan, "used to steam with romance enough to fire our youthful imaginations."

It was in those days in the dock yards of San Francisco that Hilliard Rosencrantz and Michael Keegan decided to learn to speak Chinese. They had already determined to make money; they had decided that to make it to some form of merchandising, but down there on the docks with their lungs expanded to the fresh Pacific breezes, they felt with a vague accord that they would never stoop to the pettifogging, small dickering and narrow scheming that they felt would be necessary to win success without a cent or capital in their native land. They would go out to the unconquered markets of the East and do things a big, magnificent style. They would therefore, they decided, learn to speak Cantonese, the dialect of Chinese trade.

Of course in those days about fifty American who learned Chinese were missionaries, and they didn't usually attempt to learn it till they reached China. The men who traded with Chinese merchants usually employed native interpreters, and so there was little precedent for "young Rosencrantz and Keegan in their new ambition.

Learned Chinese in Chinatown.

"There is one good way to learn the dialect," Rosencrantz, when their minds were made up to study the language, told his friend, "and that is to get married and to learn to teach us."

"Nonsense, I'm married the most important person of the lot, though cool Keegan.

"Colonel Knowlton!" exclaimed Elsa.

"That's so, by George! Stupid of me. You came down on the same boat. Fine! I know another fellow."

Strange Disease That Affects the Liberty Bell

PHILADELPHIA—Liberty bell, the most precious relic of the birth of this nation, is afflicted with an insidious disease of so serious a character that metallurgical experts have advised against sending it to San Francisco for exhibition at the Panama-Pacific exposition.

Liberty bell made the journey to New Orleans in 1885, to Chicago in 1893, to Charleston in 1902, to Atlanta in 1895, to Boston in 1903 and to St. Louis in 1904. But since its return from that last journey its home in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, the bell has been so badly afflicted the old bell for the last 30 years has widened and extended alarmingly which the experts have discovered. Vanderpoosh commissioner of the Missouri exposition, who is now in Philadelphia, says the disease is growing diagonally around the upper portion of the bell for more than a quarter of its circumference.

As in the case of a human patient, there has been a diagnosis and a course of treatment prescribed. The old bell's doctor is Alexander E. Outerbridge, Jr., who heads the department of metallurgy at Franklin institute, Philadelphia. In his report to the curator of the museum where the bell rests Mr. Outerbridge says:

It is no superbolical figure of speech to say that the venerated Liberty bell is afflicted with a serious disease. Some months ago we noted in their technical phraseology the term "diseases of metals, and recognize several such maladies. I myself have no hesitation in saying that the bell has a cancer and its circumference is increasing at a rapid rate. Cancer is a disease such as it would be subjected to in a long journey."

Blackwells Island Has Its Own Exclusive Set

NEW YORK.—Blackwells island has its aristocracy—its first families of the workhouse. The social register, say those who understand the life behind the bars, is identical with the prison register, for no one is the woman's wing can be recognized as "in society" unless she has attained four commitments.

Two commitments, or three leave one in the limbo of the parvenus; three evince a good round term in the penitentiary, does some distinction, plus the "climber." It takes four terms to make the aristocracy. Six is so pass master. As for neophytes, the use of the light crassmore is exceedingly hard.

Quite a few offenders recently came upon a woman in tears. "None of these girls will have a thing to do with me," she sobbed.

"What were you committed for?"

"Tenement house law, but then—oh—you see it was only the first time. Not that they respect you for that!"

They respected her it appeared, to the extent of freezing her out. No one would speak to her, talk to her, allow her to act as a picket against the honors in case some one should offer her a cigarette. Her ostracism seemed to cut as deeply as do any other social sins.

As a matter of fact, the workhouse is every an odd sort of a home—the only place where she may feel in harmony with her environment.

Why He Does Not "Ring True."

A small piece of foreign substance falls into the bell metal and will ruin the resonance and music of the bell. That is what we mean when we say that such a man does not "ring true." Such foreign substance has gone into the casting at his life.

GOOD DISHES.

When cooking onions or preparing them to use fresh, add a little soda to the water. This will remove and let stand in cold water for ten minutes, rinse and they are ready for use. Boyer, the great chef, says this is credited with this wrinkle. People who can not otherwise eat onions can enjoy them prepared thus.

German Gastle.—Boil two pounds of beef hard until tender then put through a meat grinder. Add to the liquor saved from the boiled beef a quart of cold water and cook until the meal is well cooked, a half hour will do, then mix with it the meat, season well with pepper and salt and cool in a deep dish. When wanted to use, cut slices and fry a deep brown. This will keep some time.

Potato Pancakes.—Peel and grate six potatoes which have stood in cold water to blanch. Mix one grated onion with the potato; two eggs, a half teaspoonful of baking powder and flour to make a thin batter. Fry in cakes until a deep brown.

Macaroni with Mutton.—Brown in butter a few slices of cold mutton and arrange them on a platter. Chop half an onion, fry in butter and add a cup full of stock, one cupful of tomato pulp with salt and pepper to season; bring to the boiling point, add a cupful of macaroni cooked in salted water and drained. Stir all together over the fire and serve hot, poured around the meat heaped in the center of the platter.

Calf's Liver en Casserole.—Fry until crisp and brown five slices of bacon. Add to the hot fat, one dozen potato balls, one dozen carrot balls, one stalk of celery diced, and six sliced onions. Cook very slowly for ten minutes, then place in the casserole. Wash the sliced liver and lay on top of the vegetables, add seasonings, a tablespoonful of kitchen bouquet, cover with a pint of boiling water and cook well covered for an hour. Do not remove the cover while it is cooking.

FOR THE LOBSTER LOVER.

Where lobsters are to be obtained fresh and in good condition, there is no more highly prized delicacy. It is not so many years ago that we were taught to plunge live lobsters into boiling water to kill them. We learned that this was an unnecessary cruelty, as they can be quickly killed by thrusting a sharp knife into the back between the eyes and tail until death will occur at once. For those who are afraid to attempt the operation of dropping a lively lobster into a kettle of water and felt like a murderer, this method will save them.

Lobsters which are full of motion and heavy are fresh and good. If the tail of a boiled lobster is lifted and springs back to its curled condition its freshness is assured. If the tail fails, relet the lobster, as it is too long dead. Boiled coral of which is red, the spawn is green before it is cooked, when it turns red, as it boilers, as they are green before boiling.

A broiled lobster is a most delicious dish and one in white the epicure delights. Split the lobster lengthwise and split down the back with a sharp knife and remove the stomach sac and intestines; the stomach is directly under the head; the intestines runs the length of the tail piece and are often colorless, so must not be overlooked. Place the two pieces with the shell part over the heat and broil for a half hour or longer. When half-cooked, season generously with butter, and when thoroughly cooked add butter, salt and lemon juice. Crack the claws before serving.

A Boiled Lobster.—Big lobsters that weigh from three to seven pounds are drop them into a gallon of boiling water. In which a fourth of a pound of salt has been dissolved. Plunge and completely cover the lobsters and cook from twenty-five minutes to three-quarters of an hour, depending upon the weight of the lobster. If cooked too long the meat will be tough. Break off the claws, crack them at the joints and pick out the meat. Garnish the lobster with the claws and use the shell to serve it in if so desired.

SPRING DISHES.

This is the time when the dandelion greens as well as other growing greens things should be often served. Perhaps you may find a few bunches of blanched dandelion plants which have been growing under a board; they will be white, crisp and delicate. Wash and cut them, adding a bit of chopped onion and oil with vinegar, salt and pepper. The delicate bitter of the dandelion soak; them especially well liked and a good tonic.

Veal Fricassee.—Cut a piece of the breast of veal into small pieces and fry in butter until brown, sprinkle with flour, stirring; add a bit of bay leaf and a few peppercorns, cover with water and cook slowly for an hour on the back of the stove or over very slow heat. Ten or two eggs, add a little of the hot liquid and add to the meat. Serve on a hot platter with a little parsley over the meat.

Liver Dumplings.—Put a half pound of calf's liver through a meat grinder. Soak a thick slice of bread in water and squeeze dry. Put a tablespoonful of butter into a hot pan, add a tablespoonful of chopped onion, salt and pepper to taste, heat three eggs and pour into the pan. Now mix the liver with the gravy. Roll out some flakes, make balls of the mixture, bake in cracker crumbs and add to any good soup. Cook until well done. Serve with the soup.

Nuts and Eggs on Toast.—Toast slices of bread, butter well and serve with three eggs, half a cupful of chopped nut meats, one tablespoonful of cream and a dash of pepper and salt. Put the nuts in a saucepan with the hot in, which a tablespoonful of olive oil has been heated. Mix and stir as it thickens. Serve on the toast when firm.

A thin slice of pineapple put on a buttered slice of bread spread with cream cheese makes a most dainty sandwich.

A pretty dish and one which is most palatable is green peas cooked in very little water seasoned with butter and poured over half cooked eggs cut in eighths.

Celery root cooked until tender and served in a sour sauce, either boiled-egg or piquante, makes a palatable side for a lamen.

ORANGE DISHES.

Oranges are adapted to many dishes as well as drinks; they make good soup, puddings, salads and desserts, as confection cakes and cake fillings. Oranges dipped and sprinkled with sugar are a delicious sauce for any pudding and will thus take the place of jelly.

Combined with stale cake and custard, oranges are a most delicious dessert.

Orangeade.—Take two cupfuls of orange juice, add ½ cupfuls of sugar, one cupful of strained cranberry sauce and two quarts of water, boil the sugar and water together for five minutes, then cool and add the strained juice. Garnish the glass with a thin slice of orange or a bit of the peel hung on the edge of the glass.

Orange Puffs.—Take a cupful of flour and a half cupful of sugar, a half cupful of milk; sift with the flour a teaspoonful of baking powder with a half teaspoonful of salt, add one egg, beaten, add one tablespoonful of melted butter, flavor with the grated rind of an orange. Steam in buttered cups 20 minutes and serve with orange sauce.

Orange Sauce.—To juice of two or three oranges add of boiling water, a tablespoonful of lemon juice, two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, four tablespoonfuls of sugar. Mix the sugar and cornstarch and add the water, cook until the starch is well cooked; add a tablespoonful of butter and the orange juice with a little grated rind.

Orange Salad.—Serve neat slices of orange on lettuce with a dressing of oil and vinegar. This is especially good with game. Another nice way to serve it is to cut oranges slices on a long salad dish garnished with candied cherries. Oranges and grapes with a bit of pineapple is another fine combination for a fruit salad. Sponge cake flavored with orange and served with an orange filling, then frosted with an orange icing, then frosted with an orange icing and garnished with orange peel candied is a delicious dessert.

Take Their First Lessons in Chinese.

where they managed to sell goods upon which the commissions amounting to $1,000. Then they went on to Japan, where they received a check for another $1,000 and found that time on their work never let up for a moment.

In China they made their greatest success because they understood the language, although at first the proposition had seemed hopeless. They found that most of the agents for imported goods were Englishmen who understood little or no Chinese. These men dealt with wholesale dealers who spoke only native languages. So when Keegan and Rosencrantz appeared, young Americans selling a new line of goods, the wholesalers favored the established English agents, and Keegan and Rosencrantz made few sales.

"Let's play a trick on the English agents," suggested Rosencrantz to Keegan. "Let's go straight to the Chinese merchants, talk to them without an interpreter and sell the goods cheaper than they can get them from the wholesale dealers because we can cut out the wholesale dealer's commission."

Even this was not always easy to do, but the young men had boundless enthusiasm, and in the end it was a policy which brought them success. From China they went on to India and before long they were dealing in various lines of American made goods, always working directly with the merchant and leaving out of considera tion the middleman.

A dozen years after this first venture in the Orient the partnership of Keegan and Rosencrantz were well known in business circles in Japan, China, India and Australia, and in sales dealing in everything from cotton cloth to locomotives. They have reaped additional harvests by importing precious stones from the Orient to the United States.

One thing Keegan and Rosencrantz had impressed upon them during their years of experience in the Orient—no matter how successful American goods might be, they went in the country. It is different in the far East. There the trader must be here, polite, diplomatic and tolerant. He must, above all else, understand the peculiar temperament of the Oriental, and the first lesson of this difficult art they had learned years before, when more boys in the Streets of San Francisco's Chinatown.

GOODNESS FOR ITS OWN SAKE

Better Live Up to Duty Than Have Correct Religious Beliefs, Declares Writer.

It is not supremely important, how correct religious beliefs are, but it is of the highest importance that our lives be in accordance with the Divine Law. To live up to the rule of duty, which is love, we shall be acceptable to God whether we know anything about him or not, and we shall be an acceptable people, no matter how correct our knowledge of him, if love be wanting.

"Theology may be the queen of sciences, but it is all a matter of opinion or belief based on evidence, as to the term. Rosencrantz stood head man in his class, and he recognized at his achievement the president Chinese consul of San Francisco the sagacious and honorable Ho Yow, conferred a special commendation upon him.

"Not only had Keegan and Rosencrantz learned to speak Chinese; they had learned to think Chinese—think the inhabitants of Chinatown sometimes quite as impatient of the Chinese way because it is good, rather than because it will secure happiness and avoid misery in the future life. In the answer to the first question in the catechism of the Chinese religion, "Your chief end" may be "to glorify God." "Or to have your sins forgiven in a year;" however that may be the result "To glorify God is very nearly the main end of the Chinese religion." They would therefore, they decided, learn to speak Cantonese, the dialect of Chinese trade.

Of course in those days about fifty only Americans who learned Chinese were missionaries, and they didn't usually attempt to learn it till they reached China. The men who traded with Chinese merchants usually employed native interpreters, and so there was little precedent for "young Rosencrantz and Keegan in their new ambition.

Learned Chinese in Chinatown.

"There is one good way to learn the dialect," Rosencrantz, when their minds were made up to study the language, told his friend, "and that is to get married and to learn to teach us."

"Colonel Knowlton!" exclaimed Elsa.

"That's so, by George! Stupid of me. You came down on the same boat. Fine! I know another fellow."

TO HIS SOUL-MATE AFFINITY

Traveling Man's Confession to His Wife Was of a Different Sort From the Ordinary.

Dear Gifts—Just in from Rocnester I am—and I am—Rochester. Not so finding a letter here from you I know you are very busy and feel lonesome job at the best, and a time from a fellow's sweetheart brightens up the whole day.

Business is nothing excitiun, owing to the season and the fact that most of you once in a while, which is most of the while.

It gets kinder lonesome around here sometimes, and I sit by the window, stick up my feet, light a cigar and dream of you—and the kids and home, and Christmas, and the Christmas dreams they are, too.

Say, I have been dreaming of an old sweetheart of mine today and was wishing I had her with me now.

She had a sweet, winsome face, deep blue eyes and wavy hair, a tall, willowy girl, just the kind to make a fellow rave over.

Don't blame me for dreaming of this last old sweetheart, for I can't help it. Confession is good for the soul, and I don't mind telling you I am dreaming of her all the time. I'm married now, but she is still my sweetheart and, what's more, she always will be for there is nothing on earth half so precious.

I'm told it isn't wise to write to one's wife concerning old sweethearts, but I must confess that the one of my dreams is really the only one I ever had; the others were merely flames. She is married now, but I'm married now and every week I drop in at her home to see her. Don't be cross at me, dear, for she is only my sweetheart.

WOOL GROWING IN CANADA A SUCCESS

This By-Product of the Farm Will Make Many Western Canada Farmers Rich.

Alberta wool growers are looking for 20 cent wool this year. That is the assertion made by a prominent sheepman of the Grassy Lake district. "It is quite within the pale of possibility that we will receive that figure from our wool this summer," said he, "and I would not be surprised to see some get more than that.

"The war has caused a great demand to be made on the woolen mills, and they have got to have the raw material."

The present season has been most propitious for the growing of wool, and the growers expect to reap a big harvest of a splendid quality. The winter has been very even, and the sheep are in good shape for the shearing.

No special areas of sheep is kept on Western Canada farms, and yet seem to do well. The advice of those interested in the culture of the fleecy animals of Western Canada, advise all who can at all do so to enter upon the raising of sheep. They have found most profitable to those who go into it, and have made a comfortable income with their means, and their farm area.

The climate is perfectly adapted to the raising of sheep, they are easily managed, and the outlay is not much money to be made out of them.—Advertisement.

"We do."

ENVOYS BUSY IN WARRING NATIONS

United States Is Now Clearing House For Diplomacy.

LARGER STAFFS ARE NEEDED

Entrance of Italy Imposes Huge New Burden on All Our Embassies—Refugees Presumed to Pay the Cost, but Suggestion Is Made That We Do It.

Washington.—With Italy in the war, the United States comes near to being the diplomatic clearing house of the whole world.

If the United States should go into the war the diplomacy of the world would be near the point of blowing up.

American diplomats and consular officers have been turned over in Italy to the Austrian diplomats.

This will be one more big burden shouldered off on the overworked American agents in several countries. Already Americans are handling the affairs for belligerent powers at around the world.

The addition of the combatant concerns of Germany, Italy and Austria will necessitate special provision of more personnel and further drafts on this country's resources of people trained for this kind of service.

Until now Italy and the United States have been the only first class powers not involved in the war. In ordinary circumstances the Italians would have been asked to divide with the American the duty of playing the friend to the warring nations.

But in the present instance it was impossible because Italy was assailed by the ally of Austria and Germany. If she had followed her arrangement with them she would have gone into the war on their side. It was from the very beginning apparent that she would not do that. Both sides were exerting every influence to enlist her, and it was therefore suspected for either belligerent to transmit its diplomatic concerns to her.

Thus the United States from the beginning was indicated as the central office of diplomacy.

It would be well nigh impossible to catalogue the duties that fall to the diplomatic agents of the mutually friendly power which takes over this set of relations when war breaks out. In England, for instance, there was a large population of Germans and Austrians. Some were naturalized, some were not. Many of both classes were property owners. Some were anxious to get out of the country and others were just as anxious that they should not be forced out of it. American agents had to look after all these interests.

When the war got fairly under way camps for prisoners of war began to be established in all the warring countries. Complaints came from these, and American diplomats had to look after the interests of British and French and Russian prisoners in Germany and Austria and the rest. Commissions have been sent to supplement the efforts of the regular diplomatic establishment in the region.

Not the least difficult services rendered by the American consuls and diplomats have been in connection with the colonial interments of belligerents. Thus there have been established in India, in Canada and in Australia special burial grounds for victims of citizens of enemy countries. Many hundreds of men are here in the big interment establishments, while their families have required attention elsewhere because they have not been formally interned, but left money in gift for themselves. These cases have created a set of problems not easy to diplomacy, but never so large as in the present war.

STANDING TIMBER.

Rule by Which to Figure Out Its Contents in Board Feet.

The contents of trees in board feet is usually figured by Doyle's rule. This rule is to deduct four inches from the small diameter of the log for slab, squaring one-quarter of the remainder and multiplying the results by the length of the log in feet. For example, to find the contents of a twelve foot log twenty-four inches in diameter (inside the bark at the small end)—24 inches minus 4 inches equal 20 inches; 20 inches by ¼ equal 5 inches; 5 by 5 by 5 equal 200 board feet.

Perhaps an easier way to get at the same result is to state the rule as follows: From a sixteen foot log deduct four inches for slab and square the remainder. For longer or shorter logs the contents would be proportioned to the length. In the above case it would be worked out thus: 24 minus 4 equals 20, 20 by 20 equals 400, for a sixteen foot log. But a twelve foot log is two-thirds of a sixteen foot log, so long as a sixteen foot log therefore log contains three-quarters of 400 board feet, or 300 board feet. If the log were twenty feet long it would contain one and one-quarter times 400 feet, or 500 feet.

A common way of estimating standing timber is to estimate the length and the top and bottom diameters and apply Doyle's rule, finding the average of both diameters and the whole length of the tree.—Rural New Yorker.

BED OF THE THAMES.

It Often Yields to Dredgers Relics of the Ancient Romans.

"Yes, sir," said the skipper of a Thames dredger as he wiped his grimy hands on the tags of his trousers, "there are many worse jobs than dredging. It is interesting and exciting work, too, for one never knows what the dredger may bring up next time he lets go.

"Do we make any rich 'captures?' Occasionally we do, but of course we bring up more and than anything else. But, generally, I believe that the bottom of the Thames is a small gold mine in disguise, but one that it is impossible to work. A 'nugget' is brought up now and again, and a 'nugget' may mean a gold watch or coins.

"Some time back a bracelet was brought to the surface a small each, and this one contained a number of watches, mostly minus the cases. Evidently they had been thrown into the river by thieves, who had no use for them.

"Human bones are brought to light at infrequent intervals, and so are old metal implements. Roman coins are fairly plentiful close by Billingsgate and London bridge, and some of the copper ones which have been recovered are as clear as new coins from the mint. Julius Cæsar's coins and weapons have been found in the upper river and some more are being implanted down by Hampton court."—London Answers.

Room For Improvement.

A certain estimate on gentleman is it all times worth listening to, though occasionally his grammar is scarcely perfect. He was dining on one occasion with the local squire, when, much to the disgust of his worthy host, a fellow crew on the old gentleman's part was pounced upon and loudly repeated by the son and heir of the house. There was a painful silence, broken at length by the host.

"My son," he remarked quietly to the young fellow, "there is an item, I admit, when our old friend's speech is a little peculiar. At such times you might be of material assistance to each other."

"In what way, sir?" asked the son.

"Well," was the severe rejoinder, "you might give Mr. X. a lesson or two in grammar, in return for which I have no doubt he would assist you to patch up the holes in your manners."—London TIt-Bits.

The best known of the Plantagenets was Richard I., king of England, called "the Lion Heart."

WHAT IS ELECTRICITY?

It Seems to Be an Effect Produced by Energy in Matter.

It is a curious fact that although evidence of electricity in a primitive way was observed as long ago as the sixteenth century it was not until its manifestation has become one of the greatest factors in our modern civilization, no one knows just what it is.

At different times it has been thought to be a form of matter, a thin, weightless fluid, a kind of force, a variety of motion and a disturbance in the ether—which is supposed to fill all space, including pores in most solid metals. Electricity is not something created by man. He has simply discovered ways of turning its manifestation to practical account.

From the time that Thales observed, centuries before the Christian era, that amber, after being rubbed by silk, had the property of attracting light bodies the bits of paper, discoveries of electric phenomena were made from time to time, but they were detached from a realization of the great possibilities brought to light in recent years.

Electricity becomes evident when rendered active by some molecular disturbance, such as friction, rupture of chemical ratios. Scientists today regard it as neither energy nor matter, but, like heat, light and sound, it is an effect produced by energy on matter.

It has been discovered that electricity is a self existent property, by which we are everywhere surrounded, and human as well as inanimate bodies can be charged with it. From this we can understand that many more remarkable discoveries of its application will be made.—Rocky Mountain News.

ARCTIC FROST BITES.

And the Popular Error That Rubbing With Snow Helps Them.

The idea that when your toes or any other part of your body begins to freeze you must thaw it out with snow is designed to be a superstition by Vilhjalmur Stefansson. Few things could be more absurd, he says, and yet this is a superstition that has been carried with many an arctic explorer through long expeditions in the north. Take one end of how even the application of snow failed to relieve the frostbite and those are taken as indications of the severity of the case instead of proof that, as a matter of fact, the snow only assists the freezing process. Any high school pupil, Stefansson says, could tell in advance what would happen if liquid air were applied to a man's cheek or nose. Of course the part would freeze instantly. Snow has the same though less rapid effect.

The whole secret of dealing with frost bites of the face is never travel, he says, is to keep the hands warm and to run the warm hand over the face every few minutes to see if any part of it is frozen. Usually, also, one can keep oneself fairly well informed about the condition of one's face by smelling it and "making faces." If a spot of skin or cheek the size of a twenty five cent piece become stiff one can always detect it by making a grimace. Then all one has to do is to take one's warm hand out of one's mitten and press it to the frozen spot for a moment until the whiteness and stiffness are gone.—Indianapolis News.

His Blasted Life.

John Grimes, a retired schoolboy, holding in a rural district, became engaged to a lady of some means who claimed to be visiting in the neighborhood during the summer. Accordingly he trun overtures as the weeks passed, she told him all was over between them, whereup as Grimes threatened to sue for breach of promise. Rather than incur publicity and notoriety by formal awaiting, through his attorney, she offered to settle for $250. "Two hundred" shrieked Grimes indignantly. "Two hundred dollars for ruined hopes, a blasted life! Never, never!" "How much do you think would be about right?" asked the attorney. "Make it three hundred and it's a bargain," declared Grimes instantly.—Argonaut.

Boyne City special 30th—Every available man was taken from Boyne Falls today to fight forest fires. The work was in charge of Deputy Fire Warden Pearson. The dry weather of the past few days has made the work of fighting serious. The flames are still confined to the scrub and undergrowth but if the rain does not come to the relief of the fighters, it will be in the standing timber. A trip through the section this afternoon showed heavy clouds of smoke all around generally north and east of Hoyne Falls. Fires can be seen on the big hills south and far from this city but this is in the underbrush and will not do much damage.

OLD SETTLERS TO CELEBRATE

There Will be Many Features That Will Make It the Best Event of the Kind Held in Region.

On Tuesday, June 22, says the Traverse City Record, the thirty-fourth annual meeting and picnic of the Old Settlers' Association of the Grand Traverse Region will be held in the baseball park at Old Mission.

Remember this date now. Attend, bring your friends, do what you can toward making the event a success and it will be one you can remember with pleasure long afterward.

The various committees have been working earnestly and have all arrangements well in hand. These occasions have always been enjoyable, as well as of historical and educational value, and some of those in the past have been exceptionally so. This year's committee realize that they have some high marks to aim at in trying to make this the best one to date, but their plans and efforts have been printed to the one achievement of making the occasion such that it will set a standard for those in the future.

The program and events will be along the customary lines. The forenoon will be given to reminiscences and settlers, distribution of badges and everything of a get-together nature that will serve to keep alive the old interests much cherished and enkindle the same enthusiasm in those upon whom in later years will devolve the responsibility of keeping it alive.

At noon a picnic dinner will be held, at which tea, coffee, sugar and cream will be furnished free to all. But the substantial making of a typical northcountry beanty meal must be furnished by the picnickers themselves. Bring your baskets, knives, spoons and food to the handle with estables of the kind you consider most appetizing.

Now that the date for holding the annual picnic and reunion of the old settlers of the region has been set, every effort should be put forth to make the event the great success that its importance demands. The early residents are fast passing away and it is fitting that the members of the association and others gather for the purpose of recounting the deeds of early days and to point out the efforts that the work of the pioneers had on the development of the region. Had not a firm foundation been laid by the first comers there would not have been developed the country that today lies in every direction from this city.

Mrs. Noble expects to re-open the Elston Hotel the last of this week or the first of next, and that popular house will be in better shape than ever. Among the improvements is a new fireplace of boulders in the office, and a patent semi-tile floor. Much new furniture and other fittings are installed and many new features introduced.

The ornamental lamp posts installed at the bridge were put into commission last Thursday night. There are two of these iron posts on each bridge approach, and each post bears five globes—the upper one having a 60-candle power incandescent lamp, and the other four furnishing 60-candle power each. They are very attractive and useful.

The Congregational Ladies' Aid Society were indebted to Mrs. Ada Shockley for a delightful day spent at her Seconds cottage on Wednesday, June 2, and to members of the society who afforded the pleasant transportation by autos. It was one of those very attractive "do as you please" days—sitting on the ground enjoying the bay and view down Pine Lake, wandering through woodland or catching a fine mess of bass, as some of the ladies succeeded in doing. The generous hospitality, the variety and bountifulness of that pot luck dinner, and the appetites in waiting, will indeed dwell in memory for many a day.

Just recollect that after August 18th, according to the statutes of Michigan then effective, it will be unlawful for any common carrier to deliver any intoxicating liquor to any person until the consignee shall have presented an affidavit showing that he is not a minor, an Indian, an habitual drunkard, a poisoned person, or otherwise ineligible to purchase liquor.

We have received a copy of the artistic program of the commencement exercises of the University of Michigan, and in the law class roll we find the name of Clark C. Coulter. This is our "Clare," a Charlevoix boy who has made good every hour of his life. He is now a lawyer, in which profession he will continue making good, or we are very much mistaken.

Hubert Paddock, who graduates this month from the United States Naval Academy as an ensign, has been assigned to the battleship New Hampshire. As Hubert is the first Charlevoix boy to win this distinct honor, Charlevoix naturally is proud. The boy will have a leave of absence before joining his ship, and we shall all delight in doing him honor. LATER—Ensign Paddock arrived Monday for a month's stay.

Copious rains the last half of last week changed everything on the face of nature and cheered many a farmer's heart. Then Sunday afternoon came the deluge, when water fell in sheets. It seemed as if the heavens had let go the accumulated moisture of a decade. The gutters were so full that the flood covered the curb, and the sewers were accompanied by a severe electrical disturbance, finally winding up with a noisy fall of hail.

The SENTINEL scribe had a tussle with a burglar at his (the scribe's) residence about midnight last week Wednesday. The burglar gained entrance to the house evidently through the cellar window, and entered the scribe's room, reaching for his hip pocket. The scribe had read that a swift crack on the skin will generally disconcert a burglar, and give the intended victim time to do some barbaric business. And so the scribe aimed for that chin nerve and let go a Jess Willard wallop. He evidently missed the mark, for he struck the wall with a force that woke him up with a badly bruised thumb that has been under the doctor's care ever since. The burglar escaped.

FATAL AUTO ACCIDENT

Collision at Burn's Hill Causes Death of Young Man.

Fog was responsible for a head-on collision at the Burns hill, north of town, Sunday night, in which William Howe, of Hayes, received injuries from which he died soon afterward.

James Myers was bound north in his car with all lights burning. The fog was so thick and low that he could scarcely see twenty feet ahead. Suddenly a buggy loomed up ahead of him. It was too late for either to turn and the collision occurred which wrecked the buggy. Riding with Howe was a young son of Frank Steathen. The latter jumped and saved himself, but Howe received fatal internal injuries.

Myers was running as slow as he could on high gear to make the grade. The drivers of both outfits discovered each other, and both turned, but the fog deceived both as to distance and the car struck the buggy at the front wheel, releasing the horse. It is a significant fact that the only injury to the car was the smashing of the headlights.

Both Howe and Steathen assisted Myers to straighten out his car, and Howe mounted the horse and rode home with no indications of serious injury. Something heard later in the night from a lantern and then to the barn with the horse. Not recuperating at the house for some time, a member of the family went to the barn and found the horse lying on the floor dead.

Willard Howe was about twenty years of age and a graduate of the Charlevoix high school and normal classes of 1911. We hear him well spoken of by all who knew him.

A coroner's inquest was held at the court house Tuesday night. The verdict of the jury held Myers responsible for the death of Howe.

SOLDIERS TO MEET

Prominent Speakers Have Been Secured to Take Part on Daily Program.

The executive committee of the Grand Traverse Soldiers' and Sailors' association met in Traverse City last week and completed plans for the annual reunion that will be held on the fair grounds in that city commencing Tuesday, June 15th, and lasting through Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. The different committees were appointed, who will carry out all the details of the program that will occupy the different sessions of the reunion. The same excellent arrangements for the housing of the old soldiers as last year will be carried out. Blankets are the only things that will have to be furnished by each party. Prominent speakers have already signified their intention of being here, including Hon. J. C. McLaughlin, congressman from the ninth district, of Muskegon, Judge Frederick W. Mayne of Charlevoix, F. W. Thompson, deputy great commander of the Maccabees, of Grand Rapids, Hon. J. W. Taylor and Rev. W. F. Kendrick of Traverse City.

There will be band concerts at least two days and Thursday afternoon there will be one of the biggest clean battles ever fought between the Spanish War Veterans and the Naval Reserves. Special musicians and entertainers have been secured and will provide music. M. B. Holley will give his lecture, "The Story of the Flags," in detail. These musical gatherings are looked forward to by the civil war survivors with great anticipation, and as year after year goes by the ranks are becoming thinner, the comrades who remain feel a significant pleasure in these reunions. For that reason all who possibly can will be in attendance for the entire reunion.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

by George V. Hobart

John Henry On Home Dinners

SAY! did you ever get ready and go out to move in a new apartment?

Take it from me it's an occupation that makes the herding of hogs look like an election night bonfire.

I'm going to talk harshly about it some day when I recover the use of three fingers, distressed by the unexpected closing of a folding door which had previously refused to fold.

However, here we are in the "cozy little nest" that Peaches sopranoed so caucasiantly for many weeks before we finally drew up into this desolate tree.

Now that we are in "the nest" she sings a different tune, poor girl. I'm sure she finds it mighty hard to hit a high C of joy when she has to put in eighteen hours a day waiting for the dumb-waiter to be fixed, and the hot water to be turned on, and the knob introduced to the dining room door, and all the other thousand and one protective promises, so earnestly given and so unfulfilled.

Now we come to the plot of the piece.

Peaches invited a few friends to a little housewarming, and an hour after they had vociferously accepted our cozy nest and because he found the Persian rug on his bald bedroom floor was made in New Jersey and quite—let us be fair with a friend—friends on our hands who had already made in Jersey their homes, I invited; each as catch can, strangle-hold barred, but go to the mat with everything from the parlor lamp to the piano.

For twenty-four hours Peaches spent her time hurrying between the intelligencers and the depths of despair, and that dinner party began to look like cold turkey.

And the next day, just as I was about to send out the S. O. S. signals, a friend—one arrived with the outfit, man, prepared to pour oil on our troubled kitchen sea.

The name of the new cook was Helga. She was half Swede and half dog.

Peaches asked her for recommendations, and Helga said that her only recommendation was her face, but that she tripped the night before and broke it just above the chin.

Peaches engaged her—what else could she do with kind and loving friends eager to exercise our silver, ware and purging their hunger at our outer walls?

Helga was shown to her room. She looked it thoroughly and then took Southern exposure, but subsided when Peaches promised her a bunch of fresh cut flowers every morning. Then the programme started for the kitchen, hoping for a moment that the hubby's poetry so that Helga could inform herself as to whether or not she had the Prohibition or Progressive ticket.

Helga discovered four bottles of beer coyly reposing on the ice in the refrigerator, whereupon her face became lighted up with the joys of anticipation and she rushed out and embraced Mrs. Hyde.

When, later on, Peaches joined me in the front room she looked somewhat pale and frightened. "It's an awful risk," she sighed. "I feel that the friendship of years may be interrupted because we have a new and uncertain cook in the kitchen—do you get me, John?"

Sure!" I said; "but what are we going to do about it, Kid? It's too late to cancel your bookings now. These friends of ours have been saving up their hunger for three days. We can't send them a hunger biscuit on a postal card and pass them up. Let's go through with it and hope for the best—maybe Helga will be good."

"I'm across my toes," Peaches moaned. "She picked up a bowl of radishes just now and said she thought strawberries were out of season."

Then she splashed down in front of us a generous portion of a brown cough mixture, and floated out again, while Peaches turned red, white and blue and I had all I could do to keep from becoming a murderer.

It afterwards transpired that in the shredded wheat which Helga was using as a brain the words dent lasse and Goodlieu had become mixed and, having taken the few-neck as a souvenir of a former employer, she had decided dent lasse meant "Enter from kitchen, smilingly, with sanatorial display; place coffee on table. Center, and exit, showing vertebrae."

However, the house warming dinner came to a finish without any casualties and the guests wed home, luxury but unpoisoned.

The next morning Peaches gave Helga Helga and she left on abruptly, followed by the prayers of all present, including the cat.

The only thing about the house that loved Helga was a diamond brooch belonging to Peaches and it followed her out into the land of adventure.

We've made up our minds, friend wife and I have, that we'll give no more dinners till we get a cook who knows the difference between brended lamb chops and the coat-suite.

Even the friendship of a lifetime isn't proof against a brass keying in the stomach, which lies there, coiling pratelessly for weeks and weeks, something.

P. S.—Helga's contract called for 12:00 per month. Sundays and Thursday evening out, and six on the wash.

I have you a little fairy in your home.

Sentence Is Commuted.

Hyde was convicted in December, 1912, after one of the most sensational court battles in the history of the country. He was sentenced to serve two years for alleged conspiracy to land frauds, but the sentence was commuted by President Wilson.

At the trial testimony showed Hyde was known among his fellow prisoners as the "angel convict" because of his work to better the conditions of the other prisoners, especially those who were poor. He was editor of the prison newspaper, Good Works, and the performances of his duties were allowed to go to all parts of the prison and mingle with all the convicts.

From the first he took an interest in their welfare. He found that baseball and a few worn-out movie films were the only amusements in the prison. He laid out plans for a complete athletic field which, with money furnished by himself, was constructed by Hyde and his fellow prisoners.

Informed Her He Had Received a Letter From Her Husband.

Wroughton left the day after the ceremony for St. Louis, where he said he would establish a home. The young bride waited for word from him, which never came. Finally, believing he had deserted her, she brought action again t him for a divorce. Then she heard Wroughton had been drowned and dismissed the suit.

She made a second venture. The young man in this case was Clyde Redding, but the match turned out no more fortunate than the first. They finally were divorced on the ground of incompatibility.

About six years ago a third matrimonial alliance was made by Mrs. Redding with Mr. Trover. According to friends they got along famously together and no cloud darkened the horizon of their wedded life until last December a friend who knew her husband said to had seen Wroughton. Mrs. Trover went to see Oliver Wroughton, a relative of her first husband, who is said to have informed her he had received a letter from the missing man three years ago. From other sources she is said to have learned that Wroughton is now married and lives in Terre Haute, Ind.

Mrs. Trover is now bringing suit against Wroughton, charging desertion, and recently Judge Thomas J. Snedecor of the circuit court granted her a decree and restored to her the name of Redding—the first her second husband

California Millionaire Says Term Was "Most Useful in My Career."

F. A. Hyde, Land Speculator, Recently Released From Federal Prison, Does Great Work Among His Fellow Convicts.

Atlanta, Ga.—When Frederick A. Hyde, sixty-seven years old, millionaire land dealer and former president of the board of education of San Francisco, left the federal penitentiary here, after serving 16 months, his first statement was that those months had been the most useful of his whole life. He added that he would return to his home in California, where his wife, daughter and three sons are waiting for him, but afraid to look any man in the face.

"Not only have these 16 months been the most useful in my career," said Hyde, "but this period has been the happiest of my life, and I have derived more good from my work at the prison than at any other time."

MAN THOUGHT DEAD TWENTY YEARS LIVES

But He Married, and His First Wife Did Some Marrying Too.

Kansas City—A rumor that a husband whom she had long believed was drowned on the day after their marriage, April 19, 1894, is alive, took Mrs. Maggie Trover, now living at Kansas City, to Joseph A. Trower, salesman for the National Line Stock Commission company, into the divorce court yesterday.

According to a number of character witnesses, their family life has been ideally happy.

About twenty years ago Mrs. Trover, then Miss Maggie Young, was married at Olathe, Kan., to Earl Wroughton, a young business man rest of the evening screaming for the fire department.

The next round was mock turtle soup, but nobody under the side canopy of heaven can ever guess where Helga found the mock.

Sometimes I think I may have surprised her secret, however, one day when I looked for my rubber boots, one of them was missing.

Then we had fish—blue fish. It had arrived in the kitchen just a simple, plain, kind-hearted fish with the blues, but after watching Helga's work it had developed acute melancholia.

Then came the roast turkey, and right there was where Helga scored to the foothlights and clamored for the Valeria Cross.

Peaches had told Helga to stuff the turkey with chestnuts, but Helga was firm in her belief that a chestnut is an old wheeze, so she stuffed the turkey with peanut brittle.

Helga had noticed several other things around the kitchen which appeared to be bored and lonely, so she put them in the turkey—one of which was the corkscrew.

When I started to carve the turkey the first thing I struck was a bone—the which Helga had put in for luck.

I make no claims that I may have surprised her secret, however, one day when I looked for my rubber boots, one of them was missing.

During the rest of the day Peaches worried so much about the men cook that she almost had an attack of nervous prostration, and I had visited the apartment with her fingers crossed, murmuring little prayers to herself and making wishes that Helga's idea of potato salad wouldn't turn out to be imitation chop suey.

Our guests arrived promptly and we could see from their manner that they'd fight that dinner as a finish.

MAKE TROUBLE FOR ROYALTY

Mentally Unbalanced of Both Sexes Source of Constant Annoyance to Rulers.

Lunatic asylums in the old world abound in inmates who are firmly convinced that they are closely related to the anointed of the Lord. It is a very common form of delusion, says a writer in the New York Sun. Until the spirit of the present was born in a week passed without some crank either attempting to shoot at Buckingham palace or at Windsor castle, demanding immediate admittance to the royal presence. The men usually insisted that they were the real husband of the queen, or else claimed to be the lawful heir to the throne. The women proved to be the lawful wife of the monarch, or else a daughter of Edward VII, born under romantic circumstances. The stories which they told were of the most extraordinary description. As they insisted on haunting the approaches of the palace, and in dogging the movements of the members of the reigning house, when they persecuted with their attentions, they ended by being arrested and usually consigned to the public lunatic asylum, where they either remained as permanent inmates, or else were permitted to go free after undergoing a fortnight's detention serving as a salutary warning.

Much of the same practice has been followed at Berlin and Potsdam, where the emperor and empress have ever since their accession to the throne in 1888 been troubled in much the same fashion by mentally unbalanced visitors. In fact, there is not a reigning sovereign in Europe who has escaped this particular form of annoyance.

A Place for Everything.

The sale owner: "No, I don't want your book. I would much rather forgive my car troubles than perpetuate them in black and white."

The book agent: "But this little book is so universally handy, don't you know. It's not merely a record, but a lot of other things. I don't suppose there's anything that could happen to an automobile without, somewhere in these diagrams covering it. You see, there are headings for practically everything. Take a look at it."

"A heading for everything eh? Don't you believe it. Here, suppose I'm driving a car along a country road this afternoon. A parachute jumper goes up in a balloon from a nearby recreation park. He swings off squarely on my auto top and crushes in. What's the heading for that disastrous item, eh?"

"Just a minute, sir. Here you are. Put it down here, sir. 'Overhead expenses.'"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

BATTLES WON BY TOBACCO

Influence of "My Lady Nicotine" Is Fully Appreciated by the British Government.

The value of tobacco on active service is now so well estimated by the military authorities that today one sees the British government doing what it had never done before—supplying free tobacco to the troops.

Only within comparatively recent times, however, has this necessity been fully recognized. Wellington condemned the practice of smoking as being "a species of intoxication occasioned by the fumes of tobacco."

Official efforts to discourage the use of tobacco were completely negatived in the Crimean war. The privations suffered then by the troops resulted in officers and men taking to the pipe as a means of consolation for their hardships, and by its aid their discomforts were so alleviated that ever since the practice of smoking on active service has been countenanced by those in command.

In consequence tobacco has played a notable and beneficial part in the wars of the past century—in Spain, from Waterloo to South Africa. Probably its soothing and inspiring qualities were never so strongly manifested as in the France-German war of 1870. It might be said, indeed, that the crushing defeat fulfilled on the Prussian was due largely to the sodden lack of tobacco, added, as it was, to the breakdown to the commissariat, whereas on the German side the soldiers, therefore did all they could to insure the troops being plentifully supplied with the weed.—Tit-Bits.

THE SECRET

A good coffee is to get pure, sound coffee. If you ask your dealer he will tell you that all coffees are pure, as the law prohibits the sale of adulterated coffee.

Not all apples are pure although they are apples. Some of them are often rotten.

Some coffees are wholesome and satisfy the law when they are called coffee but they impair and ruin the health of those who drink them. Go back with him in his reflection as he fancies himself back in those old days, and begin with the first battle of the war in the Civil war. It was 54 years ago.

The thirtieth of May in 1861 was a sort of calm before the storm. No great battle had as yet been fought. Just 48 days had passed since the firing upon the Star and Stripes at Fort Sumter. The battle of Bull Run did not take place until 52 days later. People this thirtieth of May must have felt that there would be a conflict soon; but when or where no one could tell. It was a day of suspense.

Lincoln, at the time, had not served three months as president. Between the time of his election and his inauguration seven of the southern states had seceded. Soon after his inauguration Virginia had seceded, and before this thirtieth of May Arkansas and North Carolina had followed the example of Virginia. Immediately after the fall of Fort Sumter Lincoln had issued his call for 75,000 troops. Most of the northern states, in loyal obedience to this call, had sent troops to Washington; but many of the states near the border line between the North and the South had defied the call. Some of the questions asked by the people of the North on this day must have been: "Will the rebellion be crushed?" "Can President Lincoln hold them in the Union?" But a question more momentous than these, which must have been asked by these people, was: "Will our troops at Washington defend the city?" For it must be remembered that it was only 11 days before this thirtieth of May when northern troops had been fired upon by a mob while they were passing through Baltimore on their way to Washington.

Many people, at the time, interpreted this act to mean that Maryland, too, was about to secede. True, the Union soldiers at Washington seemed at this time to be successfully defending the city; a band of troops had arrived the thirtieth of May had crossed the Potomac and had taken possession of Alexandria. This had made many people feel that they were by no means confident, for, at this time, they had just received news from abroad about the expressions of joy which had just been made by certain European powers on the occasion of the impending downfall of the American republic. Then, too, many of the news items about events of the war which had appeared in the daily newspapers indicated that there might be some foundation for the prediction of Napoleon III. Stories were among the news items that the people of the North read on this thirtieth of May. The Boston Journal for this thirtieth of May contained the following telegraphic dispatches:

"The report of the surrender of the United States troops in Texas, under command of Lieutenant colonel Lewis, to the Confederate forces under command of Colonel Van Dorn, is fully confirmed.

"General McDowell has been informed that General Lee, with 25,000 rebels, is advancing on Alexandria.

The New York Tribune for the same date was to its northern readers somewhat more hopeful. Here are some of its headlines:

"Frank Blair Ordered to Fortress Monroe."

"Harpers Ferry Threatened. The Rebels Likely to Be Surrounded."

"30,000 Troops to Rendezvous at Cairo."

These news items, taken from northern newspapers, reflect the general mood and spirit of the people in the North who were at the time reading the papers. Among them there was a spirit of uncertainty and doubt. They were uncertain as to the strength and purpose of the South. They doubted the ability of Lincoln, who had recently been elected, to handle the situation political party. They were uncertain as to whether he would yield to the demands of the rebels. Lincoln was not a trained soldier. They were uncertain as to whether he could succeed in the management of his army.

But the people of the South on this thirtieth of May were buoyant and confident. Loyalty from their point of view meant allegiance to their states. They held that the central government had no right to interfere with the formation of a new government. Their loyalty to their states alone, amounted to enthusiasm. The

NATIONAL SONG OF CHINA

Country Has Awakened to the Need of Melody to Inspire Patriotism.

After the rejection of eight national anthems composed in China since the revolution, that of the Chinese minister to Belgium, Yen Chi Chi, which, together with the song of the minister of finance, Chang Chun, belongs to the latest revolutionary period, was recently adopted by the Chinese government. Following is a translation of the first of the verses:

"China, the sublime mountains and rivers of China are the Chinese Empire. Country of wonders, through thy heavy civilization thy emperors have earned themselves in ceding the rule to the people.

"The people have the supreme power. He has taught Confucius and Mengtse. And already for the hour times of Yao and Sun. It had from people in consent of five tribes. Thousands of the five tribes in past dispute. Then China is invincible.

"Develop the wealth of the country, improve agriculture, and soon the people happy. Education and culture are the achievements of centuries. All nations are equal. Our Confucius and Mengtse have taught social equality."—Philadelphia Record.

Four Days in a Well.

In Georgia a negro man employed by a doctor to do general chores has been in a well about four days. For days without giving any notice of his intention to the doctor or his wife he did not show up, no inquiries were made. But this time he was hunting for hoes, hoes passing through a field at night he fell into an old unused well, very fortunately for him. He could not climb out, so he passed the time yelling for help. The next day he yelled some more, but no help came. Fortunately the well was dry, so he got about, but his situation was sufficiently desperate. It was on the afternoon of the fourth day that some laborers heard a faint "Hallo," and tracing the sound rescued the man from his quasi prison. He looked pale, but was not badly injured, and a hearty meal set him all right again.

ALTAR BOY SAVES ENGINEER

Found Him Bound and Gagged by Highwaymen Who Planned Extensive Robberies.

Park Ridge, N. J.—Frank English, an altar boy, was on his way to early mass when he noticed that the water wheels of the electric power plant here were still turning. Thinking this unusual, he went inside and found the night engineer, Edward Grimsch, bound and gagged.

Grimsch said he had been visited by three masked men, who told him to shut down the plant and then cut out all electric lights in the village. He also demanded that he direct them to the safe in the office, which he knew he said.

The engineer said he refused, and that they attacked him, bound his hands and feet, and thrust a gag into his mouth, and made off with $100 which he had in his pocket. The authorities are investigating the story.

The hens were making it so busy for his hawkship that Mrs. Griffin, unobserved by the foe to the chicks which was engaging in the battle, picked up a stick and fell upon his hawkship therewith and did assault him and battery until she put him to death.

After robbing her he held up Miss Hattie Harlan in a similar attack, and also took her valuables. He also robbed a little girl of 10. The lad was arrested at a skating rink and was a walking criminal. He confessed numerous robberies and said he was practicing so he could beat the "movie" actors in holdups.

MEMORIAL DAY A DAY OF THANKFULNESS

GIVE US GRATITUDE

GIVE US LIFE

"GOLD NOW FIELDS WERE WEST"

MEMORIAL day, as it is now observed in most of the states of the Union, is a day of thankfulness, of gratitude for the preservation of the Union. A majority of people who will take part in the strewing of flowers on soldiers' graves cannot remember back to the Civil war. To those who are old enough to remember the war, its memories have softened and grown calm, its material evidences have vanished and faded from sight. To those who are not old enough to remember the war, its events are only matters of history. But to the old soldier Memorial day is a day of reflection and meditation. He will be thinking of events of those "stirring times" as Irving expressed them, which, together with the song of the minister of finance, Chang Chun, belongs to the latest revolutionary period. BIRDS WARN OF AIR CRAFT

Screaching of Parrots Lets Paris Know When Hostile Fliers Approach the City.

If parrots could state the nationality of any aeroplane they hear there would be no need for men to be constantly on the outlook for hostile aircraft. The parrots would give warning quite enough.

The French authorities have had a number of parrots kept in the outposts of Paris, as well as on the summit of the power of the parrot to have some remarkable power of heralding the approach of an aeroplane when the latter has been quite invisible to trained observers stationed near.

Warning is given by the birds in a peculiar way. Their feathers literally bristle with excitement, and they yell and screech until they are hoarse. The extraordinary thing about this power of the parrot is to have some notion of the direction for hostile aircraft. The parrots would give warning quite enough.

MIXED RACES UNDER KAISER

Numerous Peoples Gathered Beneath the Banner of the War Lord of Germany.

Writers on ethnology during this war have called wide attention to what they insist on as historical fact that the valley of the Elbe, which is now Prussian territory, was once a Slavic land peopled by a race of Slavic blood called Wends. Remnants of these people are still existent in the German empire, and the Lusatians, or the Sorbs of Lusatia, in Prussia and Saxony, and the sorbins or Poneraelians and Kashby of the Baltic region are Prussians of the place that once populated Prussia. The name Prussia was once Borussia, which was corrupted from Po-Russia, a compound word signifying "near the land of the Russes," or being the Slavic word meaning "near." Other of the place names in Prussia are said to be of Slavic origin; as, for example, Pomerania, Stettin and Rodberg.

While all nationalities are a blend of various races, it is interesting to note that an authority on such matters has said that fighting under the German banner today are representatives of no less than 53 nations and tribes.

Commercial Aspect of Revivalism.

Hardly any of the great standard hymns of the Christian church are copyrighted; but nearly all of the effective ones of the present-day revivals are copyrighted and jealously guarded. Not because they are valuable as music or as poetry, but for the simple reason that they are a lucrative side line of profit for the evangelist or his business director. Sankey's success, as Moody's musical coadjutor, pioneered the way for this financial by-product. Redeshaver, Billy Sunday's aide, is interested in a publishing company that bears his name and prints and sells the hymn books used exclusively in Sunday campaigns. If one may judge from the enormous cost of producing such books side by side with the vast number that must be sold each year, it should be a very profitable livelihood, one prominent evangelist has seriously warned his fellow evangelists that the commercial aspects and activities of their campaigns are bringing not only their office but the whole cause of religion into disrepute. And it is not the first time that the writer has a very vivid impression of the unholy commercialism by the Rev. Reuben A. Torrey, D. D., in which the sale of his various publications seemed the chief concern of the great director of souls.—Joseph H. Odell, in the Atlantic.

"Tipperary" and Respiration.

The "theme of national unity" accounts for the popularity of "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary," the marching song of the British army, according to Thomas Henderson, an English musical authority speaking at University college, Nottingham. Mr. Henderson explained as follows in The Hospital:

Judging from their works, Handel and Beethoven required more slowly than Mendelssohn. Most people breathe about twenty times a minute, and he says in that a season why, quite apart from the melody, the most popular music was that in which the rhythm was even and the accent always came in the same place. "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary" was seen to point it but one reason why it should be more popular than Chopin's funeral song, "Land of Hope and Glory." The reason was that "Tipperary" was in agreement with the theory of natural respiration, while Elgar's song was not.

Wireless Lighthouses.

Twenty horse is following very closely on experiment in the use of Hertzian waves, and it is believed that the system will prove of no mean value in foggy weather when the lighthouses cannot be seen. Several steamers are being fitted with receivers and direction finders. When near a wireless station on shore the navigating officer of a ship can, with the assistance of one of these instruments, take bearings under all kinds of weather conditions, and thus lessen risk of collision. Some time ago it was thought forward to the gradual extinction of coast lights. On the south coast of France the French government has for some time been experimenting with special stations for the purpose, the signals being emitted at regular intervals.—London Tit-Bits.

Air Scouts' Phonographs.

When the military aeroplane is scouting, it usually carries two men. One is the pilot, who runs and steers the craft; the other is the observer, who marks the placing of the hostile troops, the position of their guns, the movement of trains, and the like. The observer also makes many sketches of the ground over which he is flying—work that often interferes with his writing notes and memoranda. In certain conditions of flight, too, it is often hard for him to use a pencil and paper. To obviate that difficulty the military aeroplane now frequently carries a phonograph, with a speaking tube running to the mouth of the observer, so that he may dictate into the machine at any time during the flight his observations, and afterwards he still have his hands free for his field glass or his sketching pencil."

Pipe Wood Is Used by Pennsylvania.

Pennsylvania leads all the world in the consumption of wood for use in the manufacture of pipes. Of the different kinds of material employed, apple wood is in greatest demand, for it is the principal wood used in making the so-called briar pipe. Genuine briarwood is purchased at about $250 a thousand feet. The other woods that are used, said: from lilac and apple, are far more cheap, brier and olive. The state each year consumes in pipe using the equivalent of approximately 225,000 board feet of timber, the average price of which amounts to about $25 a thousand feet.—Popular Mechanics.

TOWSER.

Towser was an old dog. He had been the faithful friend of the boy and Farmer Mason thought he was too old to be a watchdog any longer.

So he brought in a lively bone one day and put him in Towser's house. Poor Towser did not understand. He lay slept in the kitchen and the new dog had his house in the yard and ate out of his dish.

Hello, Towser," said Pussy the cat, one morning. "How do you like living in the house?"

"It was nice and warm," said Towser, trying not to show his feelings.

"Yes, I know that," said Pussy; "but you have looked out for things so long it must be hard to see someone in your place. Why, I'm a lonely fellow," added Pussy, as she went out the door.

Towser did not go around where the boy and Pussy were playing. He was ashamed. Not because they are valuable as music or as poetry, but for the simple reason that they are a lucrative side line of profit for the evangelist or his business director. Sankey's success, as Moody's musical coadjutor, pioneered the way for this financial by-product. Redeshaver, Billy Sunday's aide, is interested in a publishing company that bears his name and prints and sells the hymn books used exclusively in the Sunday campaigns. If one may judge from the enormous cost of producing such books side by side with the vast number that must be sold each year, it should be a very profitable livelihood, one prominent evangelist has seriously warned his fellow evangelists that the commercial aspects and activities of their campaigns are bringing not only their office but the whole cause of religion into disrepute. And it is not the first time that the writer has a very vivid impression of the unholy commercialism by the Rev. Reuben A. Torrey, D. D., in which the sale of his various publications seemed the chief concern of the great director of souls.—Joseph H. Odell, in the Atlantic.

"Tipperary" and Respiration.

The "theme of national unity" accounts for the popularity of "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary," the marching song of the British army, according to Thomas Henderson, an English musical authority speaking at University college, Nottingham. Mr. Henderson explained as follows in The Hospital:

Judging from their works, Handel and Beethoven required more slowly than Mendelssohn. Most people breathe about twenty times a minute, and he says in that a season why, quite apart from the melody, the most popular music was that in which the rhythm was even and the accent always came in the same place. "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary" was seen to point it but one reason why it should be more popular than Chopin's funeral song, "Land of Hope and Glory." The reason was that "Tipperary" was in agreement with the theory of natural respiration, while Elgar's song was not.

Wireless Lighthouses.

Twenty horse is following very closely on experiment in the use of Hertzian waves, and it is believed that the system will prove of no mean value in foggy weather when the lighthouses cannot be seen. Several steamers are being fitted with receivers and direction finders. When near a wireless station on shore the navigating officer of a ship can, with the assistance of one of these instruments, take bearings under all kinds of weather conditions, and thus lessen risk of collision. Some time ago it was thought forward to the gradual extinction of coast lights. On the south coast of France the French government has for some time been experimenting with special stations for the purpose, the signals being emitted at regular intervals.—London Tit-Bits.

Air Scouts' Phonographs.

When the military aeroplane is scouting, it usually carries two men. One is the pilot, who runs and steers the craft; the other is the observer, who marks the placing of the hostile troops, the position of their guns, the movement of trains, and the like. The observer also makes many sketches of the ground over which he is flying—work that often interferes with his writing notes and memoranda. In certain conditions of flight, too, it is often hard for him to use a pencil and paper. To obviate that difficulty the military aeroplane now frequently carries a phonograph, with a speaking tube running to the mouth of the observer, so that he may dictate into the machine at any time during the flight his observations, and afterwards he still have his hands free for his field glass or his sketching pencil."

Pipe Wood Is Used by Pennsylvania.

Pennsylvania leads all the world in the consumption of wood for use in the manufacture of pipes. Of the different kinds of material employed, apple wood is in greatest demand, for it is the principal wood used in making the so-called briar pipe. Genuine briarwood is purchased at about $250 a thousand feet. The other woods that are used, said: from lilac and apple, are far more cheap, brier and olive. The state each year consumes in pipe using the equivalent of approximately 225,000 board feet of timber, the average price of which amounts to about $25 a thousand feet.—Popular Mechanics.

PETS ARE GREAT EDUCATORS

No Farm Boy's Life Complete Without a Dog—Big Aid in Shaping Life to Better End.

Boys and girls who live upon farms where they may have pets of their own may consider themselves far better situated than their city cousins who do not have these advantages.

It was the prevailing opinion of the fathers and mothers a generation ago that no boy's life was complete without a dog, but the breed didn't matter much, just so it was a dog—a boy's dog.

The boat dog we older boys can remember was the mongrel of no breeding of our boyhood days. He shared our joys, our sorrows, and often our dinners, says a writer in Wyoming Farm Bulletin. He was always ready for any fun, and was usually in the lead in time of trouble. He wouldn't have taken the purple ribbon at a prize show, but with us he was blue-blooded. Should his breed be mentioned he was the most valuable animal on Mother—Sometimes there are rude boys in public schools who giggle and smile at little girls, and sometimes little girls smile back at them, but I hope my little girl does not behave that way.

Small Daughter—No, indeed, mamma. I always put out my tongue at them.

The Greatest Mistake.

It is a silly sort of pride that makes one ashamed to own up that he has made a mistake. No one, old or young, is always right, and if you are ready to admit that you are sometimes mistaken, why should you be ashamed to own up when you are wrong? The greatest of all mistakes is to pretend that you never made one.—Girls' Companion.

WORDS IN THE MAKING.

Our Language Grows by Turns Created to Fit the Occasion.

Language can be made in the it being, so doubt, and in the laboratory also, but it is most often and most effectively created in the workshop and in commonest place—among the people themselves, of one mind and expression, spontaneously in swift feeling the striking term in response to the unexpressed demand. Nothing could be better, each in its own day, than "Gladstone's oldest life" or "Lincoln's rails," which, humble and all of them as they are, contain suggestiveness to the English language and are examples of the purest English. Hon. Schuyler is an adjective devised by Mr. Howells to describe a person who was up on common in all walks of life and who are made up of only one rim at a time and of colorless character at all times. Boaty bend and bum sheets are the products of the newspaper office, while wind hammer was put together by some farmer's sober sun, inventor of the word forming diff of the behind sensorium who helped to hurry the approach of "Windsuckmer" remarked Professor Gibbs-more, thrilled by his intimate knowledge of Greek to appreciate vertical view as well as vertical college—"windsuckmer is a fine word, I grant, and so is every Anglo-Saxon compound that grows and—is not made."

But all new words are not of necessity good words. Tom Jenkins, who was himself a frequent maker of new words, deplored his shrewdness when he declared that "reason is the most certain mistress of language as the publicity stamp makes the current money," adding as a caution, "But we must be on our guard against the tyrant, every day coyness."—Brander Matthews in Harper's Magazine.

RUSSIA'S MIGHTY RIVER.

The Sluggish Volga Is Three Times as Long as the Rhine.

In Russia the rivers are large and sluggish, owing to their great length. Without fall. The Volga is the longest river in Europe. It is 2,300 miles in length—that is, three times as long as the Rhine—with a total fall of only a little over 800 feet.

The best logs in the Valdai hills, where it takes its rise, are only 750 feet above sea level, while Astrakhan, at the mouth, is only five feet below the level of the sea.

The Russian family speaks and sings of it as "Matushka Volga," or "Little Mother Volga," in gratitude or doubtless for the bountiful supply of fish, caviar and caviar, as well as comforts and pleasures afforded by this historic stream, which plays so important a part in the economic life of the nation.

The products of Asia and Europe are carried on its waters, the two thousand odd river steamers are always busy, and the barge rafts, consisting of ten or thousands of logs, being floated or pulled down the stream, represent a small portion of the riches of Russia's inexhaustible forest lands.—New York Telegram.

Where Women Swim Best.

"The Korean women are the best swimmers in the world," said a lifeguard. "The Korean pearl diving is in their hands. They swim—they don't boat—they swim out to the pearl beds, often of 'goofport, lugging baskets with them. After this swim of half an hour they dive down fifty feet and fetch up lower one shelled pearl oysters as big as babies. They dive till their baskets are full—the baskets are corked to keep them afloat—and after three or four hours' work they swim back home with their catch. The big one shelled oysters are valuable as pearl mines and as food too. A half dozen Koreans will sit down to an oyster as easily as you or I sit down to a broiled lobster."

NOTABLES IN THE LIMELIGHT

General Radko Dimitrieff, Russian Army Leader.

General Radko Dimitrieff, who commands the czar's forces of the left of Dransaul, was Bulgarian minister at St. Petersburg when the Russo-Japanese war broke out. He resigned that he might take service under the czar. Although one of Bulgaria's distinguished soldiers, General Dimitrieff has lived a great part of his life in Russia. He was born in Eisenach Russia in 1850 and in 1880 was sent to Russia to complete his military education, further already served as a lieutenant in the Russian army. He returned home in 1885 and took part in the Servo-Bulgarian war. Eastern Roumelia a part of Bulgaria, in the subsequent war with Serbia he was appointed chief of staff of the eastern army corps and served with gallantry.

The following year he showed his Russian sympathies by taking a leading part in the overthrow of Prince Alexander. But when a counter revolution ensued in Prince Ferdinand being placed on the throne Dimitrieff was compelled to flee to Russia, where he remained until his return in 1908. On his return to Sofia he received a commission in the Bulgarian army and eventually became chief of staff.

In the war of 1912 against Turkey he served as commander of the first army, under the supreme command of General Michael Savoff, and was found by his victory at Kirk Kilisse, in the first battle of the war. When the war between the Italian states broke out the following year he was made commander in chief, General Savoff declining to serve. At first he conducted a brilliant campaign, but eventually Bulgaria was compelled by exhaustion and the intervention of Roumania to give up the fight.

Governor of Tennessee.

From fares hand to chief executive of the state of Tennessee is the record of Governor Thomas C. Rye, the first Democrat in twenty years to regain the state from Republican control. The story is told that when a youth Tom Rye fitted a wild bull calf to saddle and used him as a mount when going a-courting or to church. On his first appearance in an office he found a young fellow beaux to give the young farmer a ride, and the beaux, too, tackled his tormentors and put them to flight.

The future governor was educated in the common schools of Camden, Tenn., his native town, and then went to Cumberland University, where he became a student in the law office of his father, Judge Rye, and was admitted to the bar in 1883. He was a member of the Tennessee legislature in 1887 and 1889 and was appointed by President Cleveland in 1894 to the office of United States district attorney for the western district of Tennessee, which he held for four years. He was a member of the state senate in 1903 and 1905 and was elected governor in 1910 by a majority of 50,000 over the Republican candidate.

Brings Them In With "Paint and Brush Methods."

Greencastle, Ind.—The Rev. Julius Pfeiffer, who has charge of the Pattersburg circuit in the southwest Indiana M. E. conference, is making good. Pfeiffer is using a brush and liberal quantity of paint. He has advertised himself all over his circuit.

At the crossroads he has painted his name and the time of his meetings in big red letters, all says "latin" and "suckers" and "threats" will not go with him as long as he is on the job.

One of his familiar phrases is: "I am on the job to stay; don't see the time through. If you want that soft tally kind of preaching I am not the man to give it to you. As long as I am here I am going to talk about a big God, who has a broad humanitarian platform and who really makes folks do something."

Mr. Pfeiffer says his business is "picking up" since he started his advertising scheme, and he "expects to be running his shops on full time" by June 1. He desires to "double his output" by Sept. 15.

HUNTING BURIED GOLD.

Mayoralty Aspirant Has Men Digging For Indian Treasure.

Pendleton, Ore.—R. F. Kirkpatrick, a claimant for the mayor's chair and prominent rancher on the Umatilla Indian reservation, is using all the resources at his command in a search for supposed buried treasure.

The excitement was caused by Kookoo-yes-lish, an aged Indian woman whose land Kirkpatrick has rented for the past three years. Kookoo-yes-lish that about fourteen years ago she buried a large quantity of gold in a tin can near her tepee.

The old squaw buried it about two feet deep, leaving a string attached and extending to the surface of the ground so she could find it again. The string has long since rotted off, and the woman has either forgotten the exact location of the treasure or is too ill to describe the spot. All the ground within in a radius of several rods of her old tepee has therefore been pawed up and scraped away, but so far no treasure has been found.

Looked Bad For Papa.

William's uncle was a very tall, fine looking man, while his father was very small. William admired his uncle and wished to grow up like him. One day he said to his mother:

"Mama, how did uncle grow so big and tall?"

His mother said, "Well, when uncle was a small boy he was always a very good boy and tried to do what was right at all times, so God let him grow up big and tall."

William thought this over seriously for a few minutes, then said, "Mama, what kind of a boy was papa?"—Pittsburgh Post.

An American Messenger

He Carried a Dispatch In the European War.

By GEORGE T. LARNED

Cyprian Delano, an American, went to Italy when he was twenty years of age and was so delighted with the country, the climate, the historical associations, that he found it hard to get away. Finally he settled in Rome and became a foreign resident of that interesting city. Several years passed, during which Delano became intimate with many Italian citizens of prominence and was invited to social functions in the royal circle. On several occasions he met an Italian, who seemed to take a great fancy to him.

Then like a bolt from heaven came the great European war. Poly found herself in a very equivocal position. A member of the triple alliance with Germany and Austria, a little halted stalling on the part of Italians against the Austrians, unprepared to enter the fray on either side, the government was in a quandary. Nevertheless the sympathies of both the government and the people were strongly in favor of the allies.

One day when Cyrus Delano was walking idly down the Via Nationale, watching the knots of people discussing the advance of the German troops into Belgium, he felt a tap on his shoulder. Turning, he saw a gentleman he did not remember to have seen before, who said to him:

"Signor Delano, will you please accompany me. The minister of foreign affairs wishes to speak to you."

Wondering what in the world so distinguished a functionary wished with him, Delano accompanied the man to the foreign office and without any delay whatever was ushered into the office of the secretary. There was another person present whom Delano recognized as the French ambassador. The former asked the American to be seated and then began to interrogate him. When he had finished the question he said:

"Mr. Delano, this is the ambassador from France. He desires to send a very important message to his government at Paris. In this I am equally interested on behalf of the Italian government. We are beset by spies. If we send an Italian or a Frenchman he is liable to be waylaid by secret outlaws of the members of the triple alliance. An American will have a far better chance to get through with the message than one of a different nationality. Besides, you Americans are favorite expectants. Indeed, you are a very bright people."

Of course, though he had no preference for either side, was quite pleased with the idea of such a service and at hearing been chosen for it. He accepted the mission and was told that the dispatch would be sent to him the evening, and it was arranged that he depart at the earliest possible moment afterward.

"However," said the secretary, "we have decided to intrust you with a knowledge of what the message contains. If you are waylaid and robbed of the document you can in that case proceed and deliver your message orally. We shall send a person known to be in our confidence to confirm what you say. What we desire to impart to the French government is this: As members of the triple alliance we are expected to invade France in the south while she is attacked in the north. All the French troops will be needed on the northern border. We are sending word by you that we have no intention whatever of attacking France. For the present at least we shall remain neutral."

"I understand, sir—excellency," said the man, "that I feel highly flattered at having been chosen to carry a message of such vital importance."

Delano was then furnished with funds for his journey and given instructions as to the different routes he might pursue. Then he took his departure and began preparations for his journey.

The shortest route from Rome to France territory is by way of Genoa. Therefore if spies were on Delano's track they would naturally expect him to proceed by this route. It was therefore decided that he should go by Switzerland, passing through Lucerne, Berne and Neuchatel.

Having received the dispatch, which was written in as small compass as possible, Delano called a cab and was driven to the railway station. Walking back and forth on the platform was a lady whom he had met at functions at the Quirinal palace, Miss Tuttell, a Greek, who he had mentioned was intimate with the queen of that country. The lady on seeing Delano smiled pleasantly, though he did not remember to have been presented to her.

"Oh, Signor Delano! Are you going on the train? Yes? I am so glad. I dislike traveling very much and shall be glad of your company."

Delano said that he was going to Switzerland, since he could no longer stand the midsummer weather of Rome. He expressed himself pleased in words at the lady's company, but his brows were knit, for he had been assured that he could trust no one, and the most effective spies were women.

It is said to be owing to the grace of western Australia that that part of the country is English and not French. In 1803 a party of gourmettes in French colonists landed on the west coast of Australia and set up the flag. Next morning they were alarmed by the long croaking of the frogs, which they took for dragons, and retired with all speed to their ships. Western Australia might have conferred the name on the capital, just as Rome imagine the Roman Senate did, on the goose that saved the capital.

ARGENTINE PRIDE SPURNS BIG PROFIT

Refuses Offer of $17,500,000 For New Dreadnought Moreno.

NATIONS AT WAR WANT IT.

Greece, Peaceful, Made Largest Bid Against Many Other Countries—Acquisition of Vessel Would Have Given Her a Big Naval Advantage Over Turkey.

New York.—Argentina's patriotic pride in her new super-Dreadnought Moreno, which arrived recently from Newport News, is strong.

Not even a profit of about $3,000,000 on her bargain in the South American republic would induce the warship one of a dozen which was built at Chester, N. J. The officer was made to understand that as against its title as arbiter of destinies of the Greek nation Argentina was willing to pay $3,500,000 for the Moreno, whose government was willing to pay $3,500,000 for the Moreno, which cost the Argentine Republic about $17,500,000.

Greece, however, was not the only country that made bids for the Dreadnought. Number of the warship for numerous considerations that would not Argentina a large profit.

Italy, it is understood, is anxious to add the great war fighting machine to its navy, although her offer was not as large as that made by the Athens government.

The great militarism that oppositions had been to organize mentioned Russia as the bidder, but the fact that Russia's inability to use the navy she now has eliminated that country as one of the nations that coveted the Moreno.

Turkey, it is said, have been offers for the sale of the Moreno, and Manuel A. Molina, acting Argentine consul in New York, said he had seen one which countries made the bids, but I know that all of them were rejected by my government."

The fact that Greece, not yet embroiled in the European conflict, was the highest bidder for the new sea fighter emphasizes a recent statement that the Hellenic power has been making preparations military preparations which included the purchase of the United States warships Idaho and Mississippi for $12,000,000 and are now following by the further offer of about $17,500,000 for the Moreno to add to her ready made navy.

Greece has now brought about 100,000 tons of coal in this country and a large quantity of hospital supplies, besides ammunition. The further fact that Greece was able to pay $12,000,000 in cash for the two American warships and was ready to pay the amount bid for the Moreno also indicates a favorable condition of the Greek exchequer or the readiness of a friendly power to advance the necessary money.

The New York agent to whom the Greek minister at Paris intrusted the important mission is in close social and commercial relations with Argentina, but the government at Buenos Aires refused to consider even the flattering offer that would mean a profit of 50 per cent of the battleship's cost.

The prospective purchaser or purchasers were encouraged in their negotiations by the controversy that developed between the Argentine government and the New York Shipbuilding company, which built the Moreno, over the payment for extra work, which delayed the delivery.

The acquisition of this vessel of 27,500 tons displacement and a speed of 22½ knots by the Greek navy in case of a conflict with her ancient and natural enemy, Turkey, would be of great importance and would give that country a greatly superior naval strength over that possessed by Turkey.

Argentina has proudly rejected the great inducement, and the Moreno will continue to fly the blue and white flag. The transport Chaco of the Argentine navy brought the crew for the Moreno and is now at Philadelphia. The Chaco will follow the super-Dreadnought south.

DOG A "PANHANDLER."

Bubbles Collected Pennies Enough to Pay For License.

Warren, Mass.—For the license of Bubbles, a dog owned by Edward W. Burns, former proprietor of the Hotel Bancroft, 300 cents were paid in Town Clerk William F. Duncan. Bubbles collected the cents himself from travelling salesmen and other guests in the hotel. He is a Boston bull terrier, six years old and is known to every child here.

Bubbles will not be satisfied unless he is given a cent. At all times he will refuse silver. When a cent is thrown to him he grabs it in his teeth and runs to a corner of a room and then returns for more.

At the beginning of the year Mr. Burns' son began to save the cents received by Bubbles. The cents are on exhibition in the window of a Main street store.

SYNOPSIS.

Warrington, an American adventurer, and Jonathan, a servant, both penniless, find the two shown up and down the Pacific coast. Warrington is "broke" in Panama, where he has trouble with American civil tourist, now Warrington and sets up house in the "Hotel de Paris." Later Warrington has trained a syndicate and "plays" the Panama Canal. Jonathan falls in love with Conny Gridley, daughter of the Gridleys, and they pass two golden days together in the forest. Jonathan, in a moment, interferes in a duel, and Conny, to answer to Conny's father, Warrington takes Jonathan. Warrington discovers Elsa on the steamer and plays the game to win her. Elsa's father, Count Rantzau, is a gambler who seems to avoid Elsa. Gridley sets up a "gambling house" in the back room of his liquor business and he turns up there on Warrington's "night." Warrington, in a drunken stupor, has been "doped" by Count de Rantzau, who drove Warrington, Elsa and Jonathan home from the gambling house. Warrington, on his way home, meets a "Mr. Smith" who tells him he and Jonathan are "done" for, and he goes to bed after the gambling table in Gridley's place has been broken in pieces. Elsa and Malloy bake Warrington, who keeps his temper.

CHAPTER XII—Continued.

Elsa strengthened her lips with some difficulty. She possessed the enviable faculty of instantly focusing in her mind pictures of coming events. The little sentimental pictures in the camera moves were as plain to her mind's eye as if he had already kissed her. "Have him take me in to dinner," she suggested.

"Just what I was thinking of," declared the unsuspecting man. "If anyone can place you at your ease, it will be you."

"I'll do my best." Elsa's mind was full of malicious malice.

Contemplatively he said: "Do you've been hurt by a Yankee girl? You don't like your father in that way. He was never afraid of anything, four-ace-in-the-hole, cool. I'll wager a like his nerve! man in a world like this!

"Wasn't he? How I wish he could have always been with me! But, why, he is everywhere, and, I think, that should travel over here without male escort."

"The answer lies in your mirror, Elsa. Have you of course Martha in our real protection."

"Are then so bad, then?"

"They are serious." Wearily. "The heat, the tremendous distances, the lack of amusements, are perhaps responsible. By the way, here's a packet of letters for you."

"Thanks." Elsa played with the packet, somberly eying the superscriptions. The out-of-doorier name took the place of the "I Meant No Harm." I'm telling you is on the level. She's been hobnobbing with the fellow all the way down from the Ironwoods, so I'm told. Never spoke to anyone else. Made his slit at but side at table and ashamed Italian at him, as if she didn't want others to know what she was talking about. I know the man. Fired him from my plantation, when I found out what he was. Can't recall his name just now, but he is known out here as Warrington; Parrot & Co."

The consul general was genuinely shocked.

"You can't blame me for thinking things," went on Malloy. "What man wouldn't? Ask her about Warrington. You'll find that I'm telling the truth, all right.

"If you are then she has made one of those mistakes women make when they travel alone. I shall see her at tea and talk to her. But I do not thank you, Malloy, for telling me this. A finer, honeyhearted girl doesn't live. She might have been kind out of pity."

Malloy tilt off the tip of his cigar. "He's a handsome beggar, if you want to know."

"I resent that tone. Better drop the subject before I lose my temper. I'll have your papers ready for you in the morning." The consul general caught up his pen savagely to indicate that the interview was at an end.

"All right," said Malloy good-naturedly. "I meant no harm. Just meant you don't know what you're up against."

"I'm not blaming you. But it has disturbed me, and I wish to be alone to think it over."

Malloy loomed out, rather pleased with himself. The greatest pleasure in life was in making others uncomfortable.

The consul general bit the wooden end of his pen and chewed the splinter into a cellar. He couldn't deny that Elsa was alone in her pick up some derelict for her amusement. Warrington had no business to travel alone. It was all very well when they toured in parties of eight or ten but for a charming young woman like Elsa, attended by a spinster companion who doubtless dared not offer advice, it was decidedly wrong. And therefore he determined that her trip to Yokohama should find her well escorted.

"I bee your pardon," said a pleasant voice.

The consul general had been so deeply occupied by his worry that he had not noticed the entrance of the speaker. He turned impatiently. He saw a tall blond man, bronzed and tanned, with the clear blue eyes that met his with the equanimity of the fearless.

CHAPTER XIII.

After Ten Years.

The consul general saw before him an exquisite, as the ancient phrase had it, cracked by a sufficient dose of manhood. He believed that here was a brief respite (at between acts) in which the little apparitions could be laid aside. The pleasant smile on his high-bred face was all his own.

"And what may I do for you, sir?" he asked in the conventional tones of introduction, and to while away a half hour in the agreeable discussion of mutual acquaintance.

"I should like a few minutes' private talk with you," began the well-dressed stranger. "May I close the door? The consul general with a sense of disappointment, nodded. The blond man relocked and slid down. "I don't know how to begin, but I want you to copy this cablegram and send it under your own name. Here it is; read it.

So singular a request filled the consul general with astonishment. Rather mechanically he accepted the slip of paper, adjusted his glasses, and read—

The Andes Construction company, New York. Is former employee of yours, to make a restitution of $1,000, with interest, for the loss of a pocket knife. Signature not big enough to warrant the latest restitution with fifty the last signature. Will you accept? Reply collect.

"This is an extraordinary request to make to me, sir."

"Could I possibly offer that to the cable operator? Without name or address? No; I could not do it without being subjected to a thousand questions, none of which I should dare to answer. So I came to you. Passing through your hands, no one will question it. Will you do this favor for a poor unfortunate devil?"

Oddly enough, the other could not get away from his original impression. The clothes, the way the man wore them, the clarity of his eyes, the evident sincerity of his request, all combined to make him an honest man.

"I'm sorry, but I can't do it. I'm 10 years younger I'd have punched his ugly head. His name is Malloy, and he's not a savory chap."

Elsa's cheeks burned. She never would forget the look in that man's eyes. The look might have been in other men's eyes, but conventionally had always veiled it. Ass and owl seen it before.

"Do out," but her voice was unsteady.

Somewhere along the irravaddy you made the acquaintance of a young man who calls himself Warrington. Is intimately known as Parrot & Co. He did not know exactly what to do. He looked out of the window, into the noisy court, at the sky which presently would become overcast with the daily rain clouds. By and by he remembered the man waiting patiently at his elbow.

"What is your name?"

"I'd rather not give that until I hear from New York. I am known out here by the name of Warrington."

Warrington. The pentlement rankled from the older man's face, and his eyes became alert, renewing from another angle their investigation of the stranger Warrington. So this was the man! He could understand now. Who could blame a girl for making a mistake when he, a seasoned veteran, had been beguiled by the outward appearance of the man? Malloy was right. He was a handsome beggar.

"I promise to send this upon one condition."

"I accept without question," readily. "It is that you must keep away from Elsa Charlewood, now and hereafter. You made her acquaintance under false pretenses."

"I deny that. Not under false pretenses." How quickly things went about! "Let me tell you how I met Elsa."

The consul general listened; he listened with increasing interest, and more, with conviction that the young man had been perfectly honest. Not the knowledge only added to his growing alarm. It would not be difficult for a man to win the reward of any young woman.

"And you told her what you had done?"

"Yes."

"Your first mistake!" touching the cablegram.

"My first and only mistake. I was a careless, happy-go-lucky young fool. I was the certain chap had attraction for Warrington. A thousand times a fool!

"How long ago did this happen?"

"Ten years this coming April."

"And now, after all this time, you wish to see Elsa?"

"I have wished to see back many times, but never had money enough. I have plenty now. Oh, I made it honestly," smiling. "In oil, at Promo. There's a gushing from a Rangoon paper."

The other read it carefully. It was romance, romance such as he liked to read in his books, but which was mighty bewildering to have at his elbow in actuality. What a life the man must have led! And here he was, with no more evidence of the difficulties than the appearance of the manliness of his face and the breadth and depth of his shoulders. He dropped the cuttings, impatiently.

"Don't you believe it?"

"Believe it? Oh, this Yes," he swerved the consul general. "What I cannot believe is that I am awake. I cannot quite make two and two equal four. I cannot——" Well, you do not look like a man who would rob an employer of eight thousand dollars."

Parrot & Co. It's odd, but I ridiculed that title. You were at Yokohama during the plague."

Warrington brightened. "So that's got about! I happened to be there, working on the private railway."

"I will send the cable at once. You will doubtless hear from New York in the morning. But you must not see Miss Charlewood again."

"You will let me tell her good-by? I admire and respect her more than any other woman. She does not know of my past. I'm a bad lot in spots, but she is one of those few women. God put on earth for the courage and comfort of man. Only to say good-by to her. Here in the office, if you wish."

"I agree to that."

"I thank you again." Warrington rose.

"I am genuinely sorry for you. If they say no, what will you do?"

"Go back just the same. I have an other debt to cancel."

"Call in the morning. I'll let you know what the cablegram is."

"I forgot. Here are twenty pounds. You can return the balance when I call. I was very grateful."

"By the way, there is a man here by the name of Malloy," began the consul general.

"Yes," interrupted Warrington, with a smile which was grim and cruel. "I expect to call upon him. He owes me something like fifty pounds, and I am going to collect it." Then he went out.

The consul general dropped Malloy's memento into the wastebasket and lighted his pipe. Once more he read the cablegram. The Andes Construction company. What a twist what an absurd kink in the chain! Nearly all of Elsa's wealth lay bound up in this enormous business which General Charlewood had founded thirty odd years before. And neither of them knew!

"I am not a bad man at heart," he mused, "but I liked the young man's impression when I mentioned that bully Malloy."

He joined his family at five. He waved aside tea, and called for a lemon-squash.

"Elsa, I am going to give you a letter.

"Didn't I tell you?" cried Elsa to the wife. "I felt in my bones that he was going to say this very thing." She turned to her old-time friend. "Go on, lecture me."

"In the first place, you are too kind-hearted."

"That will be news to my friends. They say I have a heart of ice."

"Not what you think is independence of spirit is sometimes indiscretion."

"Oh," said Elsa, becoming serious. "A man came into my office today. He is a rich cocoa grower from Pedang. He spoke of you. You passed him on going out. If I had been twenty years younger I'd have punched his ugly head. His name is Malloy, and he's not a savory chap."

Elsa's cheeks burned. She never would forget the look in that man's eyes. The look might have been in other men's eyes, but conventionally had always veiled it. Ass and owl seen it before.

The forty-first annual convention of the Michigan State Firemen's association will be held at Petoskey, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, July 13, 14 and 15, and given months of being the largest attended in years.

The Cheboygan river, near the dock is a veritable silver mine. Workmen engaged on the dredge near the dock are locating dimes, quarters and half dollars at almost every scoop of the big mechanical digger. Then coins are the ones missed by the kids, who for the amusement of the passengers on the D. & C. boats dive for coins of all denominations.

Don't forget that human thoughtlessness and negligence are the causes of more than half of the forest fires in this country, and that the smallest spark may start a conflagration that will result in loss of infinite destruction of timber and young growth valuable, not only for timber, but for their influence in helping to prevent flood, erosion and drought.

That there are five or six carloads of unsold potatoes in the vicinity of Cadillac and thirty carloads remaining stored in the county, was the statement of a buyer there lately. He was offering thirty cents a bushel to farmers still having 1914 potatoes on hand. It was also estimated that ten per cent of the potato crop in the counties to the north was being held by growers.

Farmers in Wexford, Oceola, Mishawaka, Lake and Manistee are planting corn, clover and alfalfa seed for the second time this spring. A majority of the crops were killed by deep frosts. Reports from the various townships in those counties show that nearly every cherry and grape which had begun to form, were frozen. The cherry trees in Grand Traverse and Leelanau counties were spared, but nearly every other county in this part of the state suffered severly from the May cold spell.

Those who are desirous of making better times for this region and also by maintaining the position of Michigan as a been producing state cannot get busy and keep soon in order to help along the movement this season. The bean is a great food and it is bound to be more valuable next year than it has been this season. It is used as a substitute for meat and when properly cooked will keep the human system in condition longer than any other one product that is used for human food. Dry all means we can to boost in Michigan and do all possible to increase its yield and usefulness.

Traverse City Record: As later reports come in from the fruit orchards of the region the chances for a good crop make steady gains. Following the frost that struck the region the last of May there was a tendency on the part of a majority to magnify the amount of damage that was done, thus having a chance to look over the orchards the damage is proving much lighter than was feared. There will not be a bumper crop, but unless some unforeseen thing happens there will be a fair yield of cherries, which was most affected by the freeze. It is becoming more apparent every day that at certain periods there is bound to be great crop injury inflicted by the frosts and that on the average a fair crop can be expected. What is lost one year is gained the next and taken as a whole the situation works out for the general good. It is always well to mix a little optimism with the gloom that invariably attends the fruit belt. After all it is the average that must be sought instead of the maximum in all things.

Could Stand It.

Little Willie was eating his first raw oyster. He looked at it with a pensive expression on his face for some minutes, and then he said to his mother, in a voice quivering with pathos: "Mamma, I guess I'm too young to be eating oysters yet. I don't have young man's appetite yet, and like that to me. I never gave my father trouble when I was a boy. Willy was not fussy at all. With a character aside he looked into your eyes and said, 'But, papa, maybe your father didn't need it.' 'Was all of Willy's meals punishment, while papa retired to another room.

BRYAN RESIGNED.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE, OUT OF HARMONY WITH THE PRESIDENT, QUITS HIS JOB.

W. J. Bryan, Secretary of State, has resigned from the cabinet. The reason given is that Mr. Bryan was not in harmony with the president in his German policy.

MERELY SCRAPS OF PAPER

Bound by a solemn treaty of alliance with France, England entered the war.

Bound by an equally solemn agreement with England and France to protect the neutrality and territorial integrity of Belgium, the Kaiser devasted Belgium and slaughtered its non-combatants, regardless of age or sex.

Bound by the international laws of warefare promulgated by the Hague conference of 1907, the German empire or has violated every law of humanity which in the wars of all ages between civilized nations, have been recognized.

Whether the Kaiser wins or loses in this war, he will be an outlaw among the peoples of the world, and his name will go into history as a monarch who sacrificed a sacatoath to extend his own power, and he calls himself the anointed of God.

TWO SPLENDID ATTRACTIONS AT THE CHARLEVOIX THEATRE IN THE NEAR FUTURE.

The Sheean Opera Company, one of the leading companies in their line on the road, are billed to appear here on June 30, and July 12, 13 and 14 the Boyle Woolfolk Musical Comedy Company will give one of the finest attractions ever shown in Charlevoix.

In order to bring these two companies to Charlevoix it was necessary for the management to make some very strong inducements and we trust that the public will show their appreciation by giving them a very hearty reception.

Further announcements and advertisements of these two attractions will appear from week to week.

SHOW IS WELL LIKED

Manager A. F. Bridge of the Charlevoix theatre is in receipt of numerous letters from other theatre managers who have played the big Boyle Woolfolk LaSalle Musical Comedy combination, which comes to the Charlevoix on July 12 for a three day's stay, in which the usual performances of the aggregation are highly praised. The press of other cities visited are equally liberal in bestowing praises. The consensus of opinion, as displayed by managers and showmen, seems to be that there at last is a real "two dollar show at popular prices."

GOOD AMERICANISM IS GOOD CITIZENRHIP

The situation between the United States government and Germany is more tensely strained than it was a week ago, mainly, by reason of the defiant, or at least evasive reply of the German foreign office to President Wilson's note of protest—a protest against German barbarity.

In this crisis every American should back up the president, who thus far has exhibited marked patience and wisdom.

Some Extremes.

The coldest place on earth inhabited by man is Verkhoyansk, about the approximate center of northern Siberia. The thermometer there drops to 90 degrees below zero in January, but sometimes rises to 80 degrees above zero in the month of June, showing, however, that the freezing point on the warmest summer day is near.

The most place in the world is the interior of the great Sahara desert, in Africa. Tripoli has recorded temperatures to 132 degrees. The wettest place is Cherrapunji, Khasi, where the mean annual rainfall is 200 inches. The place of least rain is Fort Nelson, in South Africa, where less than an inch sometimes falls in a year.

Done by the types.

Newspaper compositors and men who edit copy, no matter how experyed they may be, sometimes commit errors to get by that are either amusing or humiliating. One Chicago newspaper in reporting a political meeting said that the set audience rent the air with their shouts. Another Chicago paper reported that the Republic Aldmin was leaving port with a cargo of 40,000 bushels of oats. A Buffalo paper, in describing the scene when Roosevelt took the oath of office as president, said it was a scene that need to be forgotten when Roosevelt. Lefore the chief justice of the supreme court and a few witnesses took his simple faith.

Curious African Animal.

The African Office is to perform an unusual duty, being to protect a curious of horny nature, covered of hard frizzled hairs. He is of a very mawkwome advances to be rid of his dwellers and expects the entire world. Peaceful permission must be sunrised indeed before he will allow in individual like to approach. Not marks the approach of a stranger with an overcome attention. It is a curious boin of a tree which he could not climb, improved by the time he will bend his body arm and a half. Its right shoulder is the only part possed he will remain motionless for hours and if a bird should light on the stump or a wild animal, he is gone.

Consistent.

"Why boy, I must congratulate you on your consistency."

AN OPEN LETTER

June 8, 1915.

Editor, The Charlevoix Courier, City.

Dear Sir: I have very carefully read your article in the issue of June 2nd with reference to "Why Do Charlevoix Boys and Girls Leave School?"

Beneath this caption, I was very enthusiastic in reading the article, hoping that it would throw some light on this subject, which should be of absorbing interest to every parent in Charlevoix, but with all due respect to your conclusions, I, as a citizen of Charlevoix, extremely interested in the schools, must differ materially with your views. I most certainly cannot agree with you that the fault lies entirely with the student himself. I have not yet arrived at a point where I must concede that our boys and girls are so entirely undependable, that the responsibility for differences in school must all be laid at their door. It is doubtless true that we should all be proud of our modern school system and should admit that it is absolutely safe and reliable. However it is not conclusive that any course of study prescribed by the Board of Education is without fault. The task instead of prescribing a course applicable to all minds is an extremely difficult proposition. However, I would not attempt to criticise or approve the course prescribed in our schools, but, instead of condemning either the school, school system, teachers or the student, why not first go into the matter and ascertain wherein the difficulty lies.

Take the course, as prescribed by the Board of Education, analize it and then decide whether or not it is adequate and yet moderate. Then take the execution by the corps of teachers of this course and then decide whether or not it is efficiently, properly and diplomatically presented to the pupil and if these two are perfect, then naturally, the fault should be the condemnation of the student. But let's be entirely fair and by investigation locate the source of the trouble before condemning our boys and girls—they are too valuable to not be given the benefit of the doubt until proven conclusively otherwise.

Let's look into our system a little. We find a report card is submitted monthly to the parent to show the standing of the student. This is an excellent plan, provided, however, these cards are accurate. But in one instance I find a case where the card shows deportment 98 and during the month for which this deportment is shown the same student has been suspended for the balance of the term from one of his four subjects on account of bad behavior. Is or is not the parent deceived in this case?

Now a word as to the athletics of our school. Did you see the result of the Petoskey field meet? Charlevoix won than tail-end. Why? Can we say there is no boy in Charlevoix who would not be equal of any in Traverse City, Petoskey, Boyne City, Harbor Springs or elsewhere if properly trained and encouraged? Possibly the facilities for the training are not made available to our teachers, but why not the encouragement?

Now isn't consider the influence of the should-be chaperones (teachers) when accompanying the students on excursions. Do they consider seriously the responsibilities upon them and govern their acts accordingly? Would they criticize and condemn the student for things similar to those they possibly thoughtlessly do? The teacher's example should be and is a power over the student and our teachers should carefully consider the possible effect on the boys and girls under their care of every act of omission or commission.

I can't agree with you that ambition is a minus quantity in the make-up of our boys and girls. On the contrary, I believe that there is a great factor of ambition in every boy and girl if they are directed and brought to look at life in a proper way, and this ambition must necessarily decrease with the training of both at home and in school, and you must certainly realize that ambition is not, as you indicate, an endowment, but is a result of environment and training, and I would dislike to believe, even to any slight extent, that the decrease in enrolment is due to nothing but lack of ambition.

Therefore, would it not be wise to encourage the parent to investigate, first, the school system, second, the prescribed courses, third, the administration of the courses and fourth (but not the least) the student, and thereby arrive at the cause of the failure to make good of any boy or girl before condemning them, regardless of other conditions.

The school board, the faculty and the student are alike subservient to the will of the parents collectively but not individually, except in the latter case, and if there is a fault, is it not the duty of the parent to correct the fault, wherever it may be, rather that condemn either the board, faculty or student.

Have you ever attended one of our annual school meetings? If so, how many parents did you meet there and how would the number compare with the total number of parents of children in our school? What interest is manifested by this great majority of absent parents and would your co-actions not be less the parent given very little consideration to the school which is and shall continue to be one bone of all hope for the future of our boys and girls.

Yours truly,
R. F. SLOAN.

French Knots.

To make French knots, knot the thread and bring it up through the material; then take an ordinary short backstitch and before bringing the needle entirely out of the material wind the thread two or three times around the needle according to size of knot desired, and, holding the coils down with the left thumb, draw the needle through. This insert the needle over the edge of coils in the same hole, making the knot secure. Carry the thread on the wrong side of the material on the next knot without cutting.

The Hallett has an excellent reputation, and it deserves it.

MOW YOUR OWN LAWN

HOW AND WHEN TO CLIPP AND ALSO WATER IT

There is some difference of opinion as to whether clippings should be removed after mowing, but in general their removal is advised, especially during wet weather, since if left to lie on the surface they are conducive to the growth of molds, which in turn produce injury to the turf. On new seedings, however, or where the grass is thin, clippings can frequently be allowed to remain with benefit.

Except in rare cases, the lawn should not be watered oftener than two or three times a week, provided watering is done properly. A thorough soaking is necessary and should be given in the late afternoon or early morning. The ordinary type of revolving spray is quite satisfactory, but the amount of water applied by it is usually much less than desired. The point to be borne in mind is that the ground should be thoroughly saturated at each application to at least three inches in depth.

COMMON COUNCIL

At the council meeting Monday night a petition was received for the laying of a sewer on State street. Necessary action ordered.

The $20,000 bond of city treasurer John Cook, with John Nicholls, A. Sutter, A. F. Bridge, H. S. Harsha, John Burns, J. L. Crane and F. D. Campbell as sureties, was approved.

It was ordered that hereafter teams should handle fire department equipment instead of automobiles.

Council authorized the purchase of 500 feet of hose and other appliances required.

Ordered that beginning with Monday June 21st, the curfew shall ring at 8:00 p. m. instead of 9 p. m.

H. D. Marshall was appointed to the police force.

PAVEMENT TO BE RESURFACED

Street Commissioner Lusk has been instructed by the council to proceed at once with the work of resurfacing the business pavement of Bridge street. The material will be gravel and tarvia.

Antrim street will also be resurfaced, but the material will be tarvia and trap rock. Mr. Lusk hopes to have the work completed by July first.

REED—McGEAGH

Miss Hilda Reed and Mr. Dwight McGeagh were united in marriage by Rev. W. McKee in the Methodist parsonage at Traverse City, Sunday, June 13th.

Mr. McGeagh has just opened a men's furnishing store at Beaverton, Gladwin county. He is well known in Charlevoix, having clerked for Mr. Block and Mr. Crane.

Miss Hilda belongs to this year's graduating class, and has been a teacher in the Methodist Sunday School and is a favorite with the young people of the city. EAST JORDAN WILL CELEBRATE

East Jordan will celebrate the 4th in a style to eclipse all previous efforts. Arrangements are going forward to fill Monday, July 5th, with enough patriotic amusement to last for a full week. The program is not yet arranged, but a much larger sum than ever before has been raised for the occasion.

The new "Co. I," Michigan National Guard, will be a big attraction.

The undersigned merchants of this city believing clerks in retail stores should have working hours more in conformity with other lines of work, will close our places of business at 6 p. m. on Tuesday and Thursday evenings. This will leave four evenings a week on which the stores will remain open.

COMPANY "I" THIRTY-THIRD MICHIGAN INFANTRY

East Jordan Company "X" Wins Out in Contest For National Guard.

It is expected that the new company, (which fills the vacancy caused by the mustering out of the Manistee company,) will be mustered in within the next week or ten days. The company will go to Greyling camp in August fully equipped as National Guardsmen. Company "I" will be the only company between Lexington and Cheboygan, the honor belongs to Northern Michigan. But we are permitted to say that the success of Company X was due chiefly to two causes—the excellence of the personel of its rank and file, and to the fact that the people of the city of East Jordan were behind the company enthusiastically.

Between this and August 11th, the officers will have the men moving in preparation for camp, and we predict that the boys will compare favorably with any country company in the brigade, and will be a credit to the service. Many several applications have been made for enlistment.

QUEEN MARY'S PANTRY.

A Dazzling Array of Gold and Silver Plate at Windsor.

Among the famous pantries of the world is that of Queen Mary at Windsor. This pantry comprises two rooms of no great dimensions, but it contains treasures in the form of plate and household articles that are valued at more than a million pounds sterling. Many of these possess historic interest. For example, there is a conspicuous exhibit in the form of a table of solid silver. This is nearly a yard in length, and its top, with an area of several square feet, bears the royal arms and exquisitely chased designs of the symbolic rose, thistle, harp, etc. Every reign since that of Elizabeth has contributed to this table a design of some sort.

The most imposing of all the dazzling array of plate is the so called gold dinner service for occasions of state official state.

The walls of the two rooms of this royal pantry, the larger of which is 35 by 15 feet and the smaller a square of sixteen feet, are lined with cases of plate glass and mahogany, and in these and similar cases occupying the floor of the pantry are some of the most extraordinary examples of art in the form of plate that the world of royalty possesses.

PHYSICAL EXERCISE NECESSARY TO KEEP YOU IN TRIM FOR EFFECTIVE MENTAL EFFORT

Government experts have found out that there is a great increase in the death rate among men who are over forty-five, due to a lack of exercise on account of the popularity of the automobile. The number of men who work mind is steadily increasing and as they grow older they fail to take the exercise that is needed to keep the human system in tone. There is no physical benefit from driving and riding in automobiles except that it gives the individual a chance to get a little more fresh air than would otherwise be the case. It is a pleasant diversion, but advocated by the experts for the old fellows is golf, but it happens that golling is an expensive game to play and the great majority are barred from this kind of enjoyment.

The next best thing to keep the system in tone is the garden method, which consists in trying to beat the weeds and neighbor's chickens in the race for a crop of seasonable vegetables. There is plenty of the necessary exercise to be obtained in the garden and it is to be regretted that there are not more people who indulge in this harmless and healthful diversion. While young there are many varieties of exercise that appeal to people, but as their years increase they lose interest in the more vigorous forms of sport and relax into a state of inactivity that proves detrimental to their physical condition.

Out door exercise outdoors is the proper place for exercise when the weather will permit and there are so many useful ways that present themselves to be taken that it can be made profitable financially as well as physically. It is well to look out for the physical health and the proper time to do it

John Henry On Tipping

SAY! did you ever make up your mind not to do any more tipping? and have you backed away quickly every time you came to take the make-up off?

In a Big Town nowadays tipping is as necessary as a traffic cop. Only by the aid of one or both can you make any progress or get anywhere.

And the battle cry in each case is "Hands up!"

It's as in this country today that before a thoughtless person can careen through the merry-go-round doors of a small hotel he has to have his pocket-book on the sideswalk if he doesn't want to lose it.

On the other side, across the Big Pond, if a hotel employee does you a little favor and you don't slip him a penny or a pfennig he will smile back at you and be much obliged for the minute.

But in this country if you tip anybody with a couple of pennies the chances are you'll wake up in the nearest hospital left for a fellow-citizen who but very pictorial nurse leaning over you and whispering, "Keep calium, now, keep magnesia and calium." The doctor says you will recover everything except your watch if he can find a small piece of the medulla oblongata which you swallowed when the northeastern part of your bean when the bellhop soaked you with the ice-pitcher!"

It takes a brave man to save his money these days.

Hep, Hardy is one of those reckless tip-knowers. He thinks that all waiters have gloves and a smooth surface, thereby making it easier to slip a coin to a waiter.

He is what the laurginess would call a proper box of prodigality.

Hep hands out backsheesh like an absent-minded farmer sowing grain.

Hep's trail through a Big Town looks as though the cashier of a five-and-ten-cent store was walking from bank and had a hole in the canvas sack.

When Hep starts out to pound a public road with his rowdy-cart all the waiters in every beanfoundery within sound of his sires fall flat on their faces and yell, "Hallelujah! payday is here again!"

Fagtree and I dined with Hep at the Saint Aristotle Hotel night before last. Hep likes to dine there because the waiters are French and Hep, he tries to say, "Good evening!" in their native tongue. He knows them so bitterly he has to sprinkle the room with tip-money in order to escape himself from the squeeze into a French menu card, and in a confidential tone give an order like this to the French waiter: "Avez le bonnoy, garçon? Bring me, voulez moi de l'eau chaude; je vais me raser. Avez get a move on you?"

In a Swedish restaurant and a half the French waiter hurries back with a bowl of vegetable soup and the morbo-pepper.

That's how good that lad's French is "a-pour" lait.

As a matter of fact Hep knows exactly nine ordinary French words, including n'est pas and avez plaisir, but he has memorized the name of every street in Paris.

So when Hep extracts his nine ordinary words he begins to use up the others. He rushes, regardless of speed limits, all over the city of Paris. Out to Vaugirard, over to the Batignolles to Choisy, by rues and side streets to the eastern Boulevard Haussmann-chaise and St. Denis, then across lots to the western Boulevard des Batons, then into the high and off through the Place de la Concorde around corners, on one wheel into the Champs Elysees and on and on with the muffler off—it's running.

However, as I was saying some time ago, Hep hands and I dined with Hep and he handed us a few lessons in the gentle pastime of tipping, he surely did.

From a very distant we entered the aristocratic beanery he began the giving of alms.

The attendant at the revolving doors imprisoned a nice old lady to cell No 3 and kept her there out of from communication with the world while he waited for Hep to dig in his jeans for the customary quarter.

A bellboy, pacing a missing number, stopped short as he ran out our party approaching, arranged his face into a imitation of a Spanish blackeye, saluted Hep and received ten cents for his trouble.

Inside Bill, the house detective, loomed hurkily in our pathway and without warning suddenly stooped down to pick up a pfg. Hep gave a hoodah over the time Cop's feet and when they both came smilingly to the surface flattling Bill clutched a nickel over piece in his Westphalia and the procession moved on.

Then from some dark recess or niche in the wall something in brass button—and with a whisk broom in his hand started out like a pickerel and pointed the whisk broom at Hep. The latter produced a quarter at the something in brass buttons, where upon the brass buttons and the whisk broom and the quarter darted away again, thereby bringing to a conclusion the incident of the pickerel.

As we approached the coat room the girls in charge thereof was seen to her eyes in prayer. She didn't open them again until after Hep had on them to hear that if she spent the money he gave her for a new hat she wouldn't have to give it to the Salvation Lassies. Whereupon she was asked as to what she thought of his instruments. Then she glanced at the inside of my hat to see if it was expensive and sighed deeply as we passed on.

At the door of the soup room we were met by Effendi Bey, the head waiter.

Hep whispered something to Effendi, but the Bey wasn't listening. He was looking at Hep's hands which he knew must contain money. It's a very old Bey gag. Effendi thinks Hep at a Treasury note. With the swift ness of thought the Bey signed Hep to follow him, whereupon Effendi Bey began to hum, in my baren—my dinky little barren, the Turkish lullaby, the Murad Pasha, one of his Heptennes.

Word Hep had set in a table and stood there—counting the spoons—until Hep could find another pocket-piece wherewith to tip.

Then, Murad Pasha, doubling his share of the photos, with many bows and obeisances, faded out of our lives and disappeared mysteriously in the kitchen where he dropped an earful of Giovanni by staking his share of the plunder, with many bows and obeisances, faded out of our lives and disappeared mysteriously in the omnibus, began to splash water into our glasses.

Hep got rid of Giovanni by staking him to enough money to enable his return of the Pirate King, our friend Hep was busy tipping.

Every time he took a cigarette from his case four eager waiters would dash forward with lighted matches and Hep, desiring to show no partiality, would slip a coin to each of the Western guerillas.

One shark of a waiter swam around in the offing and every time Hep's serviette dropped from his knees to the floor the shark would retrieve it and as he came to the surface with the serviette in his teeth Hep would slip him a dime and reward him cheerfully.

It was one continuous orgie of tipping until finally we left the Prunes Palace with Captain Kidd glasses for over the pieces of sight which Hep had given him and singing in himself, "I'm be-a bottle of rum on a dead man's chest!"

Hep insisted upon taking us home in a taxi so that he could tip the starter and the chauffeur.

We stopped in the drug store a our home corner to mail some letters and when then Hep found a vending machine and tipped the scales.

Hep came out like the Hep in every Hip Town, going through the night like a cyclone through the subways, scattering pocket money right and left like so much chaff simply because they want to be looked upon as High Class Sports.

And it's hard to follow their act. It's rough sledding for the Sensible Lads who are willing to pay for service rendered but balk at the myriad of outstretched paws which line the pathways of Enjoyment.

I was talking to Miff Patterson about it. Miff invented a machine for removing unborn from pickles and made a fortune.

He has it yet, all except two cents he paid for a postage stamp which he lost to his pocketbook some nine years ago. But he has the pocketbook and he still can look at the stamp and consider it an asset.

Miff is such a cringy loosener he looks at you with one eye so as not to waste the other.

The boys call him "Putty" because he's the next thing to a putty.

I told him what time it is he takes off four minutes as his commission for telling you.

"Tipping!" said Miff, "what do you mean tipping?"

"To give a bit of coin to a waiter for a service." I explained.

"Oh!" said Miff. "I've heard about it, but I don't do it. I don't hand any waiter well enough to give him money to take home to his wife. She might meet me afterwards and thank me for it and my wife might hear about it—that's risky work.

"But you can't get good service in the restaurants or hotels unless you do a bit of tipping. How do you manage it?" I inquired.

"Easy," Miff answered; "I never go to the same hotel twice. I beat it at the head of the list and go to them all. By the time I get around to the first one again all the old waiters have grown rich and have gone back to Holmgren on Ten-ether-that's my system."

Maybe Hep is right, and maybe Miff is right. For my part I believe in moderation he said and bechune.

What do you think?

Kansas City Woman Is Growing New Crop—Her Eyesight Is Also Renewed.

"A year ago hundred years with golden tresses is the achievement which Mrs. Emily C. De Masters of Kansas City expects to accomplish. Mrs. De Masters, who is ninety-one years old, has not discovered a new tonic to preserve the natural color of her hair; she is growing an abundance of the golden-brown color of the hair of her youth, which turned gray years ago.

"By the time I am one hundred years old," she says, "I expect to have as pretty hair as any girl."

Her grandfather, John Nelson, who was one of the first settlers at Lexington, Mo., "I guess was experiencing the same phenomenon of his hair returning to its natural color in his old age.

Twenty years ago Mrs. De Masters received what she calls her second eyesight. Previous to that time she wore glasses for several years. When the glasses began to hurt her eyes she consulted an oculist who advised her to discard them. Today she sews and reads with the naked eye.—New York Sun.

Electric Installations in Roumania.

The Petroleum World reminds companies having interests in Roumania that important new regulations governing electric installations for power and lighting in oil fields have been enacted in Roumania, and that all oil properties in Roumania must comply with them before May 25. Oil engines are rapidly coming to the front for the generation of electric current in the oil fields.

Everybody Must Have Moved Out of This Town.

he called all the people together and showed them the work of the spider, and said to them: "This spider, although he has neither legs nor small thing, has used the greatest care in doing it, and has done it well—though, he should serve as an example to all of us, and whatever we do, no matter how small or diminutive we may be, we should do it just as well as we can." And because the spider set up an example for the people he commanded that no one should ever harm a spider or do it any willful injury.

"The spiders, when they heard this order given by the governor, knew that it must be obeyed, and they were very much pleased, for often the people had driven them out of the houses or killed them, when they found them weaving webs. So all the spiders got together to decide on what they could do to pay the governor for his kindness. After a long consideration they decided that the locks on the city gate could be well worn and work from long use, and that every night, when the gate was shut, there would be a number of the spiders in weave a web across it, so that it would be ready in morning for, of course, the spiders thought their webs very strong. So every night when the gate was shut the spiders would weave across the whole space in the wall which the gate closed.

"One night a band of thieves who had robbed hundreds of towns and who were constantly stored came in sight of the wall of the town where the spiders lived. "Tonight," said the chief of the thieves, "we will have to rob another town, and off there in the distance I can see a town that shows that we will not have to travel far."

The robbers waited until midnight and then they stole up to the gate of the town and when they got down they found the entire opening "covered with spider webs. Everybody must have moved out of this town," said the chief of the robbers, for here the gates are covered with spider webs. Everybody must have moved out of this town." With a shrug of his shoulders he led the way through the gate, but in passing it up to waste our time in breaking down the gate when there is nothing inside for us to steal," and so the chief and his band moved on to the next town. The spiders were hidden, heard all that the chief said, and they were delighted to think that they had saved the town for the people who had been so kind to them."

"Well," said Jack Rabbit, "that teaches one good lesson that it pays to be kind to even a spider."

"Yes," said Mr. Fox, "it teaches another valuable lesson in the way the chief of the robbers was fooled, and that it is not wise to believe everything you see, for a great many times appearances are meant to deceive."

so that when a hit is made it means something. An electric motor on the target carriage connects with a belt to drive the carriage forward and backward and forward on the track. In the case of the target shown in the illustration the figures are constantly in action, and it is an entirely different proposition to hit one, especially in a vulnerable spot, then if they were motionless. Such a target is particularly good for use in the militia or the regular army, as in the case of war it is not likely that the enemy would stand still until somebody succeeded in shooting them.

BOY SCOUT IS OVERWORKED

Turning Lads Into Amateur Scavengers or Baggage Handlers Is Traveling in Wrong Direction.

The American tendency to overwork a good thing is showing in t e case of the Boy Scouts. Not content with using the youngsters as special policemen, they have been set to work cleaning up maloderous alleys in some cities and towns and a scheme was recently proposed in one town to engage boys for a large convention.

This is not merely going too far, it is traveling in the wrong direction. The Boy Scout idea is a great one and the governor of this town of which I am telling you one day was called to the door to see a man who he now how perfectly the work was done course a climax, and Hep, believing it is all due to his knowledge of the French language, swells up with pride and begins to toss money into the air.

Hep doesn't know it, but while he is spilling that Schenectady French all over the tablecloth the waiter is pelting a stone bruise on his palate from holding back his Parisian laughter.

Hep would wrinkle his nose with anger if he heard me, but I've been present when he has blurted out some of his French idioms with the ossified accent, and it's a scream. I notify you!

On one memorable occasion he ordered lamb chops and a baked potato in French. He pronounced it as follows: "Oui, Maiesu!" and brought him a bowl of vegetable soup and the morbo-pepper.

THE SANDMAN STORY By Mac F. A. WALKER

STORY OF THE SPIDERS.

MRS. LYON'S ACHES AND PAINS

Have All Gone Since Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Terre Hill, Pa.—"Kindly permit me to give you my testimonial in favor of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. When I first began taking it I was suffering from female troubles for some time and had almost all kinds of aches and pains in one or part of back and in side, and prostrating down pains. I could not sleep and had no appetite. Since I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound the aches and pains are all gone and I feel like a new woman. I cannot praise your medicine too highly."—Mrs. AUGUSTUS LYON, Terre Hill, Pa.

It is true that nature and a woman's sex make her the greatest remedy for woman's ills that the world has ever known, from the roots and herbs of the field, Lydia E. Pinkham, forty years ago, gave to womankind a remedy for their peculiar ills which has proved more efficacious than any other combination of drugs ever compounded, and today Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is recognized from coast to coast as the standard remedy for woman's ills.

In the Pinkham Laboratory at Lynn, Mass., are files containing hundreds of thousands of letters from Women seeking health—many of them openly state over their own signatures that they have regained their health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and in some cases that it has saved them from surgical operations.

SMALL MOTOR FOR DENTISTS

Does Away With Rather Cumbersome Material Which Must at Present Be Used.

An electric motor even in small size, is quite heavy for the power it yields. For this reason dentists have been using a motor mounted on a bracket and connected by a flexible shaft with the point of application of power. Recently, however, a miniature electric motor has been devised for the dentist's use which is so small and weighs so little that it may be connected directly to the dental chucks and used as a hand tool, thus doing away with the cumbersome universal shaft, in place of the shaft a light electric cord connects the motor with a lamp socket. The motor is one of the smallest ever made for commercial use. Its weight is but five and one-quarter ounces and it is one and three-quarter inches long by one and two-quarter inches in diameter. It uses only half a watt and develops from two-thirds of a watt to one-and-one-half watts. I have a great opinion as to the merits of a dish of garlic in cookery, so to the waiter who took my order I suggested that the dish on which the lamb was to be served should be rubbed with garlic, as one frequently does in making a salad.

"When the bill came the item for the racks of lamb was not $18, but $1.50. The waiter could not explain the increase. I called for the head waiter. He went to the cracker and came back.

"The rack of lamb plate would have been $18, he explained. 'The extra $1.50 was for the garlic'.

MAN AND BREAD AND DONKEY

A Daily Spectacle in Spain Between Alcala and Sevilla.

Bread made in Alcala, Spain, is of such exceptional goodness that the village is famous throughout the country as "Alcala of the breadmakers." Naturally a spectacle connected with the trademark of the town before baking.

An early train leaves Alcala daily for Sevilla, and before daylight long lines of panniered donkey mules begin to arrive from all directions. At the station the pannniers are removed and placed in refrigerator cars, the donkeys being driven into similar cars, and mules, drivers and bread are all transported by train to Sevilla.

Here amid scrambling, hallooing and hard kicks the animals are assembled, panniers adjusted, and the bread setting out north has the advent of nestling ruffling their wares and boasting of the fineness of the alcala bread. They remain at midday, rock their empty panniers into the cars, drive in the mules, light their cigarettes and ride the third class carriages to be taken back to their home towns, ready for the following day's trade.

A charge of 18 cents is made by the railway company for the round trip of donkey, man and bread.—Argonaut.

The simplicity and ignorance of the rural Scotch magistrate often quite equals that of the English, immortalized by Shakspeare in Dogberry, and here are two examples, quite in the true Dogberry vein.

"That is a most tragical event which has just happened," said a friend to a Tobermory "Town pulmotor Mr. B. has committed suicide."

"Wha ony" inquired the bailie eagerly.

"Perhaps it was he—it was certainly another Glasgow bailie—who, his health being proposed at a banquet in honor of his recent dignity, responded nobly to the toast:

"I canna but say, me friends, that I'm proud of the honor of being made a bailie of this great city, and I'm aye, I think, entitled to the honor, for I've gone through all the various stages of degradation that a bailie has to do ere he reach it."—Youth's Companion.

CARE OF A WATCH

Uncle Sam's Experts Will Tell You All About It.

WINDING IS ALMOST AN ART.

It Should Be Done Cautiously and With the Strictest Regularity—Even the Size of the Watch Pocket May Affect the Accuracy of a Timepiece.

Do you know how to handle, carry and wind your watch properly? Do you know at what time of the day you should wind it, the pocket in which it is best to carry it and the position in which you should have your watch at right or when it is not in use?

These are some questions which Uncle Sam will answer for his 100,000,000 slaves and peshaws of such of them as are the possessors of pocket watches.

Instructions as to the use and care of watches are given in a publication issued by the bureau of standards. They are based on conclusions reached by scientists after careful tests and on the practical experience of some of the leading watch manufacturers of the land.

The importance of handling a fine watch carefully and of winding it regularly is known to almost every one. But rules for the proper treatment of watches always have varied greatly, and it is for this reason that the bureau of standards investigated the matter and prepared standard instructions which it advises owners of watches to follow.

The foremost in its set of rules, first mentions against allowing a watch to fall or receive a severe jar, either of which is liable to injure the mechanism, especially in the balance, the jewels or the trembling of a jewel. The mere fall of a watch to the seat of a chair or the jar it may receive when the article of clothing in which it is being carried is thrown down or dropped may cause serious injury to the movement. Even the seemingly innocuous jar of jumping on or off a street car may injure it seriously.

Likewise care should be taken to keep a watch from becoming magnetized by proximity to electrical apparatus, although the troubles from this cause are being reduced by the present use of construction of dynamos and motors. The watch case should be opened as seldom as possible and then only in places where there is little chance of dust settling into the movement. A broken watch crystal should be replaced promptly, even if the watch has a hunting case.

Among other instructions of winding a watch regularly the bureau of standards states:

"Even the delay of an hour in the time of winding may cause considerable variation in the time, in some instances. The winding should not be done lightly, but steadily and not too rapidly, and its conclusion should be approached carefully to avoid injury to the spring or winding mechanism.

"It is generally regarded as slightly better to wind the watch in the morning than at night, as the large variations of the balance under the tight spring will perhaps give more uniform results with the movements and jars of the watch during the day than if the balance wheel were subjected to the lesser tension there some after winding. The difference is, however, not so important as the careful winding of the watch.

"The pocket in which one carries his watch, the size of the pocket, and the kind of watch chain or fob used have a more important effect on the uniformity of a watch's rate than is generally realized. In a large pocket the watch is apt to turn to the right or left by various amounts, giving irregular rates, unless one adopts some method of holding it upright. Perhaps the best method to prevent a watch turning in the bowl, other than actually pinning it in place, is to have the watch in a chamois or kid watch bag, such as may be obtained from watch cases, correct size to fit one's pocket. The watch cannot turn in this if the pocket is large enough to permit it turning. The bag also protects the watch and keeps it cleaner."

The care of the watch at night or when it is not in use is another important item concerning which the bureau of standards states:

"At night or when the watch is not in use it is desirable to have the watch in the same position as during the day, and preferably in some place where it will not be subject to any great temperature change. If it is desirable to place the watch in a horizontal position during the night for the sake of concentrating any considerable gaining or losing of the watch in the pendant up position during the day the same precaution to avoid marked temperature changes should be observed. And the position with which such a change of position is carried out may be as important as regularity of winding."—Washington Star.

CARE OF A WATCH

Uncle Sam's Experts Will Tell You All About It.

WINDING IS ALMOST AN ART.

It Should Be Done Cautiously and With the Strictest Regularity—Even the Size of the Watch Pocket May Affect the Accuracy of a Timepiece.

Do you know how to handle, carry and wind your watch properly? Do you know at what time of the day you should wind it, the pocket in which it is best to carry it and the position in which you should have your watch at right or when it is not in use?

These are some questions which Uncle Sam will answer for his 100,000,000 slaves and peshaws of such of them as are the possessors of pocket watches.

Instructions as to the use and care of watches are given in a publication issued by the bureau of standards. They are based on conclusions reached by scientists after careful tests and on the practical experience of some of the leading watch manufacturers of the land.

The importance of handling a fine watch carefully and of winding it regularly is known to almost every one. But rules for the proper treatment of watches always have varied greatly, and it is for this reason that the bureau of standards investigated the matter and prepared standard instructions which it advises owners of watches to follow.

The foremost in its set of rules, first mentions against allowing a watch to fall or receive a severe jar, either of which is liable to injure the mechanism, especially in the balance, the jewels or the trembling of a jewel. The mere fall of a watch to the seat of a chair or the jar it may receive when the article of clothing in which it is being carried is thrown down or dropped may cause serious injury to the movement. Even the seemingly innocuous jar of jumping on or off a street car may injure it seriously.

Likewise care should be taken to keep a watch from becoming magnetized by proximity to electrical apparatus, although the troubles from this cause are being reduced by the present use of construction of dynamos and motors. The watch case should be opened as seldom as possible and then only in places where there is little chance of dust settling into the movement. A broken watch crystal should be replaced promptly, even if the watch has a hunting case.

Among other instructions of winding a watch regularly the bureau of standards states:

"Even the delay of an hour in the time of winding may cause considerable variation in the time, in some instances. The winding should not be done lightly, but steadily and not too rapidly, and its conclusion should be approached carefully to avoid injury to the spring or winding mechanism.

"It is generally regarded as slightly better to wind the watch in the morning than at night, as the large variations of the balance under the tight spring will perhaps give more uniform results with the movements and jars of the watch during the day than if the balance wheel were subjected to the lesser tension there some after winding. The difference is, however, not so important as the careful winding of the watch.

"The pocket in which one carries his watch, the size of the pocket, and the kind of watch chain or fob used have a more important effect on the uniformity of a watch's rate than is generally realized. In a large pocket the watch is apt to turn to the right or left by various amounts, giving irregular rates, unless one adopts some method of holding it upright. Perhaps the best method to prevent a watch turning in the bowl, other than actually pinning it in place, is to have the watch in a chamois or kid watch bag, such as may be obtained from watch cases, correct size to fit one's pocket. The watch cannot turn in this if the pocket is large enough to permit it turning. The bag also protects the watch and keeps it cleaner."

The care of the watch at night or when it is not in use is another important item concerning which the bureau of standards states:

"At night or when the watch is not in use it is desirable to have the watch in the same position as during the day, and preferably in some place where it will not be subject to any great temperature change. If it is desirable to place the watch in a horizontal position during the night for the sake of concentrating any considerable gaining or losing of the watch in the pendant up position during the day the same precaution to avoid marked temperature changes should be observed. And the position with which such a change of position is carried out may be as important as regularity of winding."—Washington Star.

FEW NOW DIE OF OLD AGE.

Why This Is So and Why the Patriarchs Lived So Long.

Scientists who see today how few people live to be 100 years old find themselves at a loss to explain how Methuselah managed to live 969 years, while Noah lived to be especially old at 950 years. Recently, however, a theory has been made which helps to explain the mystery.

When the causes of short life now always are sought it is found that most of the deaths are due to disease. Very few people die from old age. And the reason why people die from any one disease is that they have been weakened by other illnesses which they have had or which have been handed down to them by their ancestors. For example, one widespread social scourge which weakens the constitution of many men and women today was probably unknown in primitive times.

To some of these ill ones the human race has become so accustomed that it is immune. Measles will kill off a whole Indian tribe, but among the white races it is only an annoying childhood malady. But the varieties of disease increase for more reason than the immunity.

Noah and the patriarchs didn't have nearly as many different kinds of diseases to force because they hasn't had enough ancestors to hand them down a variety. Consequently their constitutions were not constantly being weakened as are ours today. For example, there is no reference in very ancient literature to a cold in the head. The Greeks and Romans seem to have been the first peoples to suffer from it.

The real reason why the patriarchs lived longer than we do now was because in those days the fund of immunity was fresher. While immunity to certain diseases may have handed down to us by our parents, we have also received the weakened vitality which was theirs as a result of their fight against disease. Sooner or later the race will become immune to everything, but with that immunity will come the diminished power as a result of mankind's long fight against the white plague.—Washington Post.

NATIONAL OFFICIAL BOOKS.

They Are Named by Colors and Cover a Wide Range of Hues.

British government publications are called "blue books," because they are usually bound in blue paper covers, because blue is the distinctively recognized color in parliament and law. In the departments, however, "blue" books are printed in yellow covers to distinguish the department. Diplomatic correspondence with foreign countries and short acts of parliament are often left unbound or "white," because there is no strict rule for binding any documents less than an inch in thickness.

In addition to the "blue book" there is the "red book." This contains a list of persons who hold government offices. The only other color used by England is black. A black book contains a complete or some phase, the same, which is "yellow book" originating from the famous "black book" compiled in the reign of Henry VIII. to expose the abuses in monasteries.

In France the chief color for government publications is orange. Belgium uses gray, Italy green, the United States blue and red, Spain and Austria red and Germany and Portugal white or cream.—New York Press.

ZEPPELINS TO FIRE AERIAL TORPEDO

New Device Is Guided by Radio From Aircraft.

ITALY HAS NEW DESTROYER

A Double Biplane, With Place For Mounting Big Guns, is in the Service to Fight Hostile Airships—New German Machines Can Also Make Their Own Poison Gas.

London.—Much ingenuity is being expended in adding to efficiency for destruction by German airships. The Rotterdam correspondent of the Daily Mail says: "The latest device is a aerial torpedo which is proposed to be used by the new super-Zeppelins. It is made of aluminum and filled with gas. When discharged from a tube in the airship the torpedoes, it is stated, are sustained by gas and controlled by wireless from the airship. They can be directed from a great distance and exploded at any point required.

"Professor Hollinger of Stuttgart has invented a trench protector against shell fire. It consists of an artificial stone, which is mixed with sand and pumice three times greater than reinforced concrete. It is manufactured in slabs two yards square and will stand a temperature of 1,000 degrees. The lighter infantry rifle fired at fifteen yards did not even crack it, although it was less than 0.3 and only half inches thick."

The Daily Mail's Copenhagen correspondent says:

"The new type of Zeppelin airship is rounded at the front and has a sharp tail. The vessel is heavily armed. Three decks carrying powerful gun and bombs are slung beneath the grounds or navigational chamber and are fitted with a newly invented bomb dropping apparatus.

"The new airship has a smaller crew than the ordinary Zeppelin, but her speed is reported to be much greater. Among the crew are men able to make a fresh supply of poisonous gas bombs during a voyage.

"It is reported that ten airships of the new type are being built with great more are stated to be in course of construction for the purpose of taking part in a proposed aerial invasion of England."

An aerophane "destroyer," designed for attacking dirigible airships, has been installed in Italian government workshops in the last few months. It is an enormous machine with three separate engines and with a total energy of more than six horsepower.

It consists, in fact, of the bodies of two ordinary tractor biplanes placed side by side and far enough apart so that there is room between them for the propeller of a third engine. Each of the two main bodies has its own engine and tractor screw in front, so that it looks at first like two ordinary tractor biplanes flying hand in hand.

On the section of wing which joins the two bodies is placed the body work of an ordinary pusher biplane, with the engine and propeller behind. In this way the body projects well forward in front of the screws of the other two engines, so that it can carry a gun of considerable size and have a clear field of fire forward, backward and on both sides, without danger of hitting its own screws or wings.

The machine is capable of lifting a large cargo of bombs large enough to be certain to destroy a Zeppelin if they hit it, and far enough apart to make it impossible for a battleship to damage both at once.

SUBMARINE BASE OFF IRISH COAST?

Speculation as to How Raiders Get Supply of Oil.

NAVAL MEN DOUBT THEORY

Submerged Tanks in Inlets Could Furnish Gasoline to Underseas Craft. However, Torpedoes Must Be Replenished and Crews Must Have Rest On the Boats.

Washington.—Speculation as to the German having established secret submarine bases in isolated coves along the Irish coast was revived in semi official circles in Washington by the publication of a dispatch from Crook haven, Ireland, which told of a submarine having been sighted and fired upon near that place.

For years time there has been a strong belief here that there lurks been secret submarine bases of this character somewhere along the western or southwestern coasts of Ireland. It was definitely ascertained, however, that no information had been received by the navy department from its intelligence sources abroad confirming the discovery of such an supposed secret base. If there are any such bases the traditions in the shores of Ireland may have been conveniently utilized by the Germans for that purpose.

In the absence, however, of definite knowledge that such a base has been established, well informed naval officers can think of no the explanation of the facility with which German submarines have been able to operate in the stretch of water between Fastnet rock, the first lighthouse seen by trans atlantic passengers bound for Queenstown and Liverpool, and Bishop's rock where they catch their first glimpse of a lighthouse when going to south ampton.

Naval officers apparently are agreed on one point—that none of the submarines that have attacked merchant ships off the south and west coasts of Ireland have gone to those sections of the German naval war zone around the British Isles by way of the strait of Dover or the English channel. The British have so effectively protected the approach to the English channel by a mine field extending from Ostend to the entrance to the Thames that no German warship, floating or submarine, has yet been known to have passed that obstruction.

Naval officers here do not believe that submarines could successfully pass through this mine field. They also point to the announcement recently made in parliament that England had been able successfully to transport about 750,000 soldiers from Iron land to France and Belgium across the channel without the loss of a single transport or the death of a single man during the cross channel journey. If German submarines were able to go to the south coast of Ireland by the channel route and there sink merchant ships, it is pointed out, the same submarines could have sunk British troop ships, which would be of greater military advantage to Germany than the mere sinking of merchant ships, which carry only noncombatants.

With the English channel approach to the west and south coasts of Ireland as well as to the Scilly Isles closed, the German submarines would have to take the North sea and north of Scotland route to the western shores of the British isles. Having once set submarines to the Irish coast, it was said here, the Germans might obtain the long journey around Scotland to and from Ireland and Germany, by establishing secret bases on the Irish coast, and the theory is very strong that this has been done.

The naval experts, however, believe that the submarines have made the journey back and forth around Scotland. One high naval officer said that the Germans were known to have submarines with a steaming radius of 4,000 or 5,000 miles, which could easily negotiate the long journey. It was suggested to him that if there were secret bases on the Irish coast there might be submerged tanks of gasoline which the submarines could visit at night, relying then to replenish their fuel supply and then making their route and that it was easy to transfer that they have constructed large tanks that could be towed under water.

This officer intimated that this was possible, though he did not believe it had been done. He said that the use of such tanks was proposed some time ago in this government, but he believed, in the light of a great deal of information that he had received, that the German submarines were not following the secret base practice. He pointed out that it was necessary for submarines to replenish their supplies of torpedoes, something that could not be done from a secret base as easily as replenishing gasoline stock, and that what was even more important, the work of the men who operated German submarines was so exacting and the strain upon them so terrific that it would be necessary for the crews to return to Heligoland bases after their raids to recuperate. This officer also said that, while it was barely possible that the Germans might be making use of a remote island or cove, there would be many persons on watch along the Irish coast for such bases to remain easily a secret.

BARBED WIRE IN WAR.

It is Used in Various Ways and is a Deadly Defense.

Barbed wire is today as necessary a part of an army's equipment as pontoons or trenching tools. In war barbed wire is used in various ways, but its main object is man stopping. It is interlaced with ground peas in front of trenches for the purpose of tripping charging troops, it is strung across bridges and main roads to prevent the passage of cavalry, and it is used for fencing in camps to guard against rushing tactics on the part of the enemy.

Whenever possible barbed wire entanglements are hidden in long grass or in hedges, so that advancing troops will be trapped while the enemy raises their lines with shot and shell. Barbed wire concealed in undergrowth is particularly deadly where cavalry is concerned, for the wire gripe the horses' hoofs, causing them to fall on the spike strewn ground.

At times certain roads that it is desirable to have passable to townspeople have to be rendered impassable to an army. To accomplish this strong fences of barbed wire are built from one side of the road to the other until they form a mass. A peasant with time to spare can pass this barrier by laboriously threading his way through the narrow zigzag passage left open, but an army of several hundred men, especially if they have guns or few mounted, must halt to destroy the entanglement.

The barbed wire used for military purposes possesses long, jagged joints which inflict most painful wounds on the body, especially when men and horses fall on to them headlong, as so often happens.—Philadelphia Press.

The Daffodil.

Originally the daffodil was known as the asphodel. From this to daffodil was the first verbal transition. The name gradually resolved itself into daffodilly—the form adopted by Milton in the beautiful line, "The daffodillies fill their cups with tears." However, before Milton wrote, the flower had come to be generally known as the daffodil, and it carries under the name in John Parkinson's "Garden of All Sorts of Pleasant Flowers," published in 1629. Parkinson found more variety in the daffodil than in any other flower, nearly a hundred kinds being described in his work.—London Chronicle.

The Right Place.

"Really, Kate," said the young man, in considerable agitation, "I am very sorry I lost my head and kissed you. I didn't think what I was doing. It is a sort of temporary insanity in our family."

"Well, Roy," replied the young woman, "if you ever feel any more such attacks coming on you had better come right here where your infirmity is known, and we will take care of you."—New York Times.

The Difference.

Petoskey News: Mathew (Matt) Hoffman, who was reelected in February for the past thirty-five years and who has become widely known here, passed away at 11:00 o'clock Thursday at his home, 309 Grove street, after being sick about six weeks. Petoskey News: The Walloon Lake case brought by Henry Bacon and eight other owners of lands bordering on the lake—including the McManus Lumber company of this city—as complainants, against Dennis D. Lamb of Cadillac, in which an appeal was had by defendant, has just been decided by the supreme court in favor of the complainants. The final decree requires the width of the dam at the outlet of the lake to be reduced in width from thirty-five feet, as it is at present, to fourteen feet, and at that width to be lowered ten inches from its present height.

Central Lake Torch: Grim death has again claimed as his victim another of our oldest and most respected pioneers, James Arnold. Stricken with apoplexy Thursday morning, he answered the last roll call Sunday morning. He was surrounded by all of his immediate relatives, except a brother and sister. The funeral was held at the home Tuesday afternoon, conducted by Rev. Philip Hooper, and he was laid to rest in the Lake View cemetery. Mr. Arnold was well known in this section, and a multitude of friends from far and near gathered to pay their last respects to the old soldier. The large attendance and beautiful flowers mutely testified to the high esteem in which he was held in the community.

Grand Rapids Press: That famous Petoskey sun spanner—the regret that has done its share for the slogan, "There's Only One Petoskey," met an ignominious fate in Grand Rapids Friday afternoon. Surrounded by a bloodthirsty crowd of Petoskey Elks and others and laid out in a reckless manner in the gravel of the baseball park adjoining Market avenue, S. W., the sun spent was given a taste of fire and brimstone that caused it to writhe in agony and despair. A nearby resident, seeing the fire eating up the serpent, notified the fire department and the hose wagon from No. 6 responded. But there was nothing doing. "Forget it," said the Petoskey Elks. And the firemen threw no water. His nibs, the wiggly, wriggly, sea serpent whose likeness has been printed in many papers, was burned from the tip of his twenty or thirty foot tail to the cavernous mouth; "That's easier than taking it back," the Petoskey Elks said, according to firemen at No. 5.

STRICT SANITATION FOR SUMMER RESORTS

State Board of Health Issues Instructions to Cottagers and Others.

In an effort to provide proper sanitation at the various summer resorts in Michigan the state board of health has issued rules and regulations to be observed by cottagers and other visitors and local boards of health are being ordered to see to it that they are enforced.

"Garbage must not be thrown into the lake," says the state board of health. "A garbage can or barrel with a fly proof cover should be used at each cottage. The contents should be removed two or three times a week and buried at least one foot under ground. No pits into which garbage is being dumped will be tolerated unless each quantity of garbage is immediately covered with at least three inches of earth. The burning of garbage in bonfires will not be tolerated.

"Throwing tin cans, bottles or other rubbish or refuse on the beach or on the grounds is prohibited.

"Cleaning fish upon the beach is strictly prohibited. Refuse from lunch counters, lemonade stands, pavilions and other concessions must be treated as garbage and immediately buried. Throwing refuse of any kind into the lake is strictly forbidden.

"The emptying of drains or sewers into the lake is strictly forbidden.

"To be realized, which insanitary conditions bear to the breeding of flies should be carefully considered and no insanitary in which flies have an opportunity to breed should be exposed.

"Violation of these regulations will give rise to the establishment of nuisances which are detrimental to public health and visitors will be subject to the law relating to the maintenance of nuisances."

THE MATTER OF ADVERTISING

What we say in this article applies not to the SENTINEL alone but to all country newspapers. While some business men are good patrons in the matter of advertising, there are many who pursue a course that is manifestly unfair to the newspapers.

They will advertise in theatre and church entertainment programs, on drop curtains and dead walls, electric devices and other schemes of uncertain value; many of them promoted by outside agencies, forgetting the newspapers that weekly go into hundreds of households where advertising counts.

The country paper is the champion of the town in which it is published. It is eternally singing the praises of its market interests and advantages, for which it gets nothing. The local paper is the most valuable of a town's assets. It never ceases fighting the battles that from time to time are forced upon its town. It gives freely of its column space to the churches and schools, and to the literary and educational societies in which the town takes pride, and is compelled to go about begging for the advertising patronage that it has richly earned.

The loyal country editor will not buy his clothes or shoes outside of his own town, and he cannot consider advertising that competes with merchants of his own town. The class of whom we speak may it does not, but it should, and if it does, ignoring their home paper map at every special advertising proposition that comes their way.

Is it fair?

Next Wednesday night at seven o'clock (standard time) the steamer City of Boyne will leave Wilber's dock with a Sun Hurr excursion for Boyne City.

About a hundred feet of the fine stone retaining wall on Alice street fronting Capt. George Weaver's residence collapsed one day last week. It is being rebuilt.

R. F. Sloan, the past week has been in Toledo and Buffalo. At Toledo it was business, but at Buffalo Mr. Sloan attended the annual convention of the National Civil Engineers' Association.

Pretty girls in pretty costumes, chic and dainty, are not the least attractive parts of the Boyle Woolfolk LaSalle musical show which opens a three day engagement at the Charlevoix theatre on July 12.

The steamer City of Boyne will give an excursion to East Jordan, Sunday, June 27th. There will be a ball game between the Charlevoix and East Jordan teams. Boat leaves Wilbur's dock at 9 o'clock.

If one is to believe the talk about town there will not be room in the theatre to hold the people who want to see the Boyle Woolfolk LaSalle Musical Comedy Combination. Everyone seems to be bent on seeing this big two dollar show at popular prices.

Don't let the Masonic Fair slip from your memory. It will be pulled off the second week in August—6th to 14th inclusive. Capt. Sam Rose and the various committees are making good progress, and the success of the event is already assured.

The members of the local Masonic Lodge attended divine service at the Baptist church last Sunday morning, on the occasion of the Festival of St. John the Baptist, and the sermon by Rev. Mr. Vinyard is very highly spoken of by all present.

An old gentleman named Van Ness, of Cincinnati, who, with his family, occupied the Hines residence on Park avenue, died suddenly last Friday night. Having suffered for some time with heart trouble his death was not entirely unexpected. The remains were taken to Cincinnati Saturday.

The Hotel Michigan (formerly Elston) is now fully open to the public and already has good summer bookings. This popular house is better than ever in all its appointments. The rear dining room is a gem. The office has a magnificent faced boulder fire-place and entirely new furniture. The house is in all respects a credit to Northern Michigan.

Some great catches of steel head trout in Pine Lake are reported daily, weight running from half and a half up five pounds. These splendid game fish, which were planted several years ago by the fish commission, are rapidly increasing, and are a great attraction for resort people. Many have been caught in Round Lake.

When your meat answer Rose on the street do not form conclusions too quickly. Andrew was put out of commission, but it was not in a strap, notwithstanding his head is crushed in bandages. Mr. Rose was painting something red, (not the town) and some of the paint got into an eye, the poison spreading over nearly the whole of his cranium, causing much pain and strong language.

Geo. J. Barney, wife and daughter, of Charlotte, are guests of Dr. W. H. Barney.

Capt. Sam Rose was summoned to South Haven Thursday by the death of an uncle.

Mr. W. P. Jenks, an experienced hotel man, is the clerk and monitor at the Beach Hotel.

Phil. Beaudoin, one of the Gloucester bunch of Charlevoix fishermen, is back in Charlevoix to remain.

Misses Minnie Payton and Deonna Hartlett went to Chicago Saturday for a week's visit with friends.

Mrs. Arthur Cohen, (Sarah Levinson) of Jackson, with her young son, is a guest at the Hotel Michigan for the summer.

Musselman, the well-known and popular rug man, is here again and will soon display his beautiful goods at the cottage stand. Theatre block.

Lisle Shanahan and his two young sons left Tuesday for Williamston to visit his parents. The boys will remain there for the summer.

The steamer Fannie Rose has been laid up the past week receiving new floats. The floats are manufactured by Arbutus took her place on the Boyne City route.

The big 40,000 resorters automobiles make the little cars, which shall be nameless, look like thirty cents half spent. There are several of the big cars here and more coming.

Every train and boat brings crowds of summer people from about every where south and east. All evidence indicate that this will be the biggest resort season on record for Charlevoix.

Grand Rapids Press: Lee Howland, building contractor of Charlevoix, was adjudged bankrupt on the petition filed by himself in District court Monday. His schedules show liabilities of $15,000 and no assets other than those which are exempt. The case was referred to Referee Wicks.

The beautiful old maples of Charlevoix charm the eye of every appreciative stranger who strikes the town, and are even the joy of the habitat. We have seen them grow from saplings never cease to admire them. The magnificent trees of Charlevoix are one of the chief attractions of the most attractive towns in Michigan or anywhere else.

Sport is the keynote of the many Boyle Woolfolk attractions. That is one reason why his LaSalle Musical Comedy Company, which comes here on Monday, July 12, for a three day stay is so well regarded. There is not a dull moment in any of the shows. Everything goes with a pep and vigor that can't help but command admiration.

John Nordrum, who is one of the Charlevoix fishermen who spent the fall season here a few years ago, is back here with his pastime best Alice, and will remain from now on. Mr. Nordrum left Gloucester May 27th, entering the coast to Nor. York, up the Hudson river to Albany and the Erie canal to Buffalo. On the lakes he was windbound several times, but arrived in shape and in mighty glad of it.

Last season the Charlevoix Home Association placed a number of bird houses throughout its grounds, as nesting shelters for wild birds, an action that should be heartily approved by all bird-lovers, proscribing the limit of speed. On Sunday last there was a rank and apparent violation of the law in this harbor by one of these racers, and a collision occurred in which a sailing yacht was damaged. Notice is given by the custom house that there will be trouble for someone if this is not stopped at once.

The Charlevoix Summer Home Association has just received a carload of calcium chloride to be placed upon Belvedere avenue and the drives within the grounds of the association. It is a granular substance that has been used successfully in one of the Chicago parks with marked benefit. It is a disinfectant, will not track or injure tires, and has a marked affinity for moisture. Our street committee will undoubtedly investigate.

A noon fire alarm Thursday took the entire fire department to the north side to fight a fire in the roof of the Shanhan residence on Mishkan avenue. A spark from an adjacent chimney probably caused the trouble. Quite a large space of the roof was burned through, and the blaze reached an upper room igniting the bedding. Water and smoke did most of the damage, which is estimated to be about $250. As usual, the fire department work was prompt and efficient, the chemical doing good work. The house was unoccupied, but tenants were expected in ten days. The contractor says the house will be ready.

ARLINGTON HOTEL AT PETOSKEY DESTROYED

Next Largest Resort Hotel in the North Country Burned to the Ground.

The New Arlington hotel, the largest summer hotel in Northern Michigan, except the Grand at Mackinac Island, was completely destroyed by fire early Saturday morning, says the Petoskey News, during the worst early season wind storm this section has ever experienced.

The wind was blowing the waves clear over the lighthouse and coming from the west off the open lake struck the hotel with full force and the firemen could do little. The flames were whipped across the top of the building and once an open hole was burned through the north wall and the flames were driven quickly through the corridors and rooms on the east side especially.

The alarm was sounded at about 4:40 o'clock Saturday morning and within a few minutes the whole fire department was on the job. The lines of hose were laid into the building, but like the Imperial fire of some years ago, the department could accomplished no more than to feed the flames and nothing could be done.

The fire evidently caught around the elevator shaft and on the first floor and had no doubt been burning some little time before being discovered. The fire burned rapidly and within an hour and a half the hotel was burned flat to the ground and Petoskey's largest summer place had gone up in smoke.

The heat was terrific on the east side and firemen could hardly stand to fight the flames there. It was so hot the rails on the south bound track of the G. R. & I. were warped out of place.

The fire spread of course first to the old part of the building on the east side and more slowly to the west and laterally to the wing on the north burning everything in the whole building, which was completely furnished and ready for the summer season.

The hotel had been opened a few days before for the purpose of cleaning, redecorating and painting it and placing it in shape for summer.

THE NEW BEACH HOTEL.

The new Beach Hotel is now fully open to the public and as fast filling up. The transformation of this fine house is indeed a revelation.

The capacity of the house, including the c

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

John Henry On Vanity

SAY! have you ever noticed that the big called Vanity can cook up more trouble for human beings than any germ that ever built its nest in a brain cell?

It's a subtle little disease, this fever we call Vanity. No man ever knows he has it but he can always recognize the symptoms in his neighbor.

Sometimes it breaks out in diamond rings on the fingers; sometimes it takes the form of ragtime clothing accompanied by rainbow neckties, and sometimes it drives a man into politics who should remain at his post as the chauffeur of a garbage wagon.

And then again there are occasions when it breaks out in a man until after he is dead and his will reads, "I give and bequeath the sum of thirty thousand dollars for the purposes of scattering my ashes from the highest peak of the Himalaya mountains."

Hen Hardy has it for keeps. Around of the club the other night I saw him drink seven Scotch highballs because somebody swiped him all up by telling him he never showed the effects of liquor.

Then he had to lean against the buildings all the way home.

Even found wife had proof against the Vanity microbe.

Not long ago some fresh friend told her that she was getting stout and Peaches promptly fell for every obsolete remedy known to modern science.

During her exclusive moments Peaches has the general appearance of a Freshwriting canary bird, but when some amiable idiot told her that day by day she was growing more like a bulldog she put up a fierce battle against the accusation and strange to relate, she finally made a convert to the belief herself.

I tried to fix her and talk her out of it, but she waved me back and said she wasn't fooling through the wind chasperoning a double chin.

No Peaches started in to put the exhibits to the fatty tissues, and for a week our ornamental personal home became a place for the Indian mutilation "A Rough Night at Sea."

When I returned home on the eve of the Battle of Kishoquoti I found Peaches scrolling around the room as made up to look like a lady scarecrow. Her face was concealed behind a mask. Her mask show was a feverish glitter in her eyes and in both hands she clutched a book which proclaimed itself "The Road to Beauty; or, How to Get Thin Without Calling in the Coroner."

As I breezed through the turnstile with a cheery "Good evening, darlingsie!" she turned her acetylene lamps on me and buried me to a standstill!

Then she threw both herself and the book on our Indian-hooked rug and began to roll around the room. Seeking new worlds to conquer, she rolled out into the hallway, bumped into the sideboard, and exit, rolling into hall with plate-rack.

"What's the idea?" I gasped, when friend wife rolled back into my life again and dropped anchor in a Morris chair.

"Reducing," she answered in the stilt, sweet voice of a vaudeville runner at the end of the ninety-fourth mile. Then she rushed out and weighed herself and came back with the glad tidings that she'd lost six and one-quarter ounces.

"Eat one of our new cook's breakfast rolls and you'll break an ankle!" I suggested, and Peaches didn't speak to me for twenty minutes.

The next morning Aunt Louisa Mitt

Sometimes It Takes the Form of Rag.

while fragments of a Victor Herbert medley rattled coyly in her hair.

Mrs. Hardy dropped in for a few days without limit and told Peaches that the only real way to reduce the flesh is to take a leaf from her book, picked out a long walk and took it.

After she was gone about six hours and in was getting dark she called me up on the long distance and broke the news to me that she had walked some fifteen miles, and that she had been terribly extravagant and had used up all the walk that was in her, and would I please be so kind as to send a taxi and not leave her to perish in a strange land among the savage tribes in the Ozarks.

When Peaches reached home that night she found that all the flesh she had lost was her pocketbook. Twenty-ing ten dollars, and I was set back ten dollars for cab hire, making a net reduction of four pounds—hidden money.

A few days later while I was down town Mrs. Carruthers dropped in, also a bunch lines, and carefully explained to friend wife that the only way to beat back an attack of avoirdupois is to take exercise baths.

A day or two later Mrs. Fitzsustain, who tips the beam at 242, flopped in like an amiable seal and told Peaches that her system of physical torture was all wrong. Once more I hotfooted it for the shopping district, and, armed with one of those rubber contrivances which you carefully fasten to the wall, and then take hold of the handles and try to pull it off again.

Bright and early the next glad morning Peaches grabbed the handles and was pulling away from her flat intimate self at the rate of an ounce an hour when one of the rubber strings suddenly quit the job and Peaches came kicking Kelsey Peaches just where a good singer gets her coloratura.

When Peaches fell wounded on the field of battle she decided horribly that something must fail, and her as she selected our new talking machine, and there was such a crash that we now look thought the end of the world had arrived, and she came running in the direction of Paterson, N. J.

I had to pour a pitcher of ice water over Peaches before she came to, and then she found that she had lost by the accident the one was her breath and $24 worth of records.

Peaches was sitting on a Caruso, with her left foot embedded in a Tetrazzini.

"What's the idea?" I Gasped.

An hour later Peaches gathered on the family plate and exchanged it for an electric blanket, which she had sent home immediately.

It was cold that night so I wasn't at all surprised to see what happened when I opened the bedroom door.

I figured on reaching Dreamland by the fast express-but, heavens! how warm it began to get.

"The janitor is sure annoying the street and giving hard" when a stray broke, whereupon Peaches went over board with a scream that upset most of the furniture in the room and knocked her manicure set down behind the house.

One of the cats went up in the air and landed on the bridge of my nose because my face happened to be in the way when the cat came down.

When loving hands finally untangled Peaches from the chain drive of a cookies chair she found that, with the help of the roving machine, she had lost exactly twenty-one—plenty of the best in the show.

THE SANDMAN IN STORY

By Max F. A. Walker

LAZY GRAY.

All the other squirrels called him Lazy Gray, which was really but a very nice name for a squirrel to have, but it fitted this squirrel, and I am going to tell you how he came to be called by such an unpleasant name.

When Lazy Gray was born there were three little squirrels in his family, but he was the youngest, and his mother thought he was the prettiest, and all the rest of the family used to wait on him a great deal, and his mother did not ask him to do errands or to climb trees or do any other hard tasks that most squirrels have to do. And Lazy Gray took advantage of the kindness of his mother and his brothers and sisters and used to ask them to wait on him. When he was thirsty and wanted a drink of water, he would call to his mother and say, "I am thirsty," and she would take a bucket and go down to the brook and fill it with nice cool water and bring it to him for him to drink. And sometimes he would not even say, "Thank you," when he had finished.

And he used to make his brothers go on long journeys through the woods to pick particular food, one of which, he was very fond; and if they happened to bring him one that was not good, he would find fault with them and tell them that they did not know good nuts from bad ones.

All through the summer he loafed away the time, sometimes lying in the sun, and never a single nut did he gather for himself. And the reason and his two brothers were taken ill, his mother said that he would have to help herself and feed his brother, because she could not gather enough to last the whole family through all the long winter. Lazy Gray was very hard that he should be asked once to work for his brothers even if they were sick, and he complained very bitterly about how hard it was for him to climb trees all day and drive nuts. Whenever he would, he stole away and lay down behind a rock and went hidden from his mother and his friends. And then she would tell him, when he got cold and stiff from sleeping all over the ground and he was hungry, he would wish that he had been a good squirrel and had gathered the nuts while he could.

But Lazy Gray believe her, and said, "Oh, I have gathered all the nuts I shall want, and I am going to work any more!" and then he would go to sleep again.

Weeks passed by, and it grew colder and colder, and the snow came, and all the squirrels began to draw on their stores of nuts. Lazy found that he got pretty hungry sometimes and that the habit of eating and drinking was a wasteful one because it made him want to eat and drink all he wanted in the winter. And as he had never taught himself self-control, he ate all he wanted, and very early in the winter he began to see that the nuts he had gathered would not last the half way through the winter, almost before he knew it his whole store was exhausted and he had both leg to eat.

Then he asked his mother to let him have some of the nuts that she had gathered, and seeing a good opportunity, she told him she would let him have just as many as he could, but she wished to keep some for his sick brothers. When she would not give him all he thought he ought to have, he decided that he would go over to a neighboring tree and join a squirrel over there for some of his nuts, and for weeks he went from one tree to another begging nuts, until all every squirrel in the wood hated to see him coming, for they knew he was going to beg food that he should have gathered for himself.

At last he became so much of a nuisance that all the squirrels in the wood held a meeting and decided that each one of them would give two nuts to Lazy Gray when he came to them and that he would have to live for the rest of the winter on the store they contributed or else he would starve.

When Lazy saw what a small store of nuts he would have to live upon until spring he was frightened, for he had eaten in a week almost as many nuts as these were there.

But he knew he had to make them last, so he ate very sparingly, and his sides began to be big plump and his cheeks less full, and by spring time he was a pretty sorry-looking squirrel, with his ribs showing plainly through his sides and his bushy tail looking bigger than the whole of the rest of him.

But it taught him a good lesson, and early in the next summer, just as soon as he there were any nuts to be had, he began to store them away in the cleft of a tree against the hard days that might come again, and he had a big hole in the tree filled full and his mother was much pleased.

"Do see," she told him, "how thick it is not to provide for the future and store up things that are necessary against the time when you need them." And Lazy agreed with her and told that never again so long as he lived would he merit the name of "Lazy."

TEACHING CHILDREN TO SAVE

Idea is to Have Young People Deposit Small Sums Which Belong to Them as Result of Work.

IN CHARLOTTE A. BAKER, Colorado Agricultural College:

When you are worried to death about your bills, do you ever think of Mr. Micawber's definition of happiness and of misery? "Annual income twenty pounds, expenditure nineteen nineteen six, results happiness; annual expenditure twenty pounds ought and six, result misery." . . . and, in short, you are forever fussed." Part of a child's education should be learning to avoid being "forever fussed," and this means he must be taught to save.

In 1911 we had 1,338,874 children in the public schools, and about one child in eight had earnings to a school savings bank. It is not the idea of these banks to have the children bring money to their parents or friends, but to deposit small sums which belong to them as the result of self-denial or self-help.

If you are interested in this movement and want to know what has been done and is being done to teach children self-control and thrift, read the government bulletin called School Savings banks. You may get it by writing to the United States Bureau of Education, Washington, D. C., and by asking for bulletin forty-six of the 1914 series.

LEARN TO USE YOUR BRAIN

Householder Had Not Missed Winding Clock Every Night for Years—It Was a Habit.

Most of us plod along doing the things we have always done or doing what all the rest do. It is a bold man who shortens a path. Most of us waste an hour, now and then, doing something that we think could be better if we minutes. If we would use our minds.

An old man had a fine clock with chimes, says the Twentieth Century Farmer. He wound it every night, he said. For 35 years I have never missed a night in winding the clock at 10:30 o'clock.

The great, who happened to be a mechanic, examined the clock closely and a political amie overpowered his mind.

"What's funny?" inquired the homebody.

"Why," said the visitor, "I was trying to figure out how much time you have wasted. This is an eight-day clock."

"Yes, I can waste time dawdling over it instead of winding it, talking to the man of another, or listening with one ear, or doing things at the wrong time so they have to be done twice, or forgetting what has been done before. If asked the time right after looking at your watch, do you look again?

Heritage or Habit.

We are very likely to speak of cheerfulness as if it were a heritage. "I wish I had a disposition like sunshine," sighs many a girl. "She always sees the bright side of things." But that cheery disposition is far more likely to be a habit than a heritage. And lately the habit of looking on the bright side is one that everyone can cultivate.

The Reclaimed Garden.

The garden of Versailles was at one time the finest in the world, the land being reclaimed from a vast stagnant marsh at a cost, it is said, of forty millions. Each of our farms may be beautiful and productive if we are ready to pay the price. Our heart, no matter how overgrown with weeds is now may become a sunny garden.—Girls' Companion.

Armies Must Have Hay

Many Shiploads Will Go to Europe—Farmers Advised to Plant Wheat and Oats Stubble to Sudan Grass—Farmers' Notes Taken in Payment for Seed.

This is going to be such a big year in the demand for hay (owing to the war) that it will surely pay the farmer to raise an extra amount for forage.

Two Crops From Your Land

After you have taken off your small grains or other crops this month, or at any time before July 25th, put that land right back into Sudan Grass, and raise a heavy tonnage forage crop by fall. This ought to double your net income on that land.

Sudan Great for Hot, Dry Weather

"Through the dry weather of July and August, when many other crops and pastures suffer badly, the new wonderful drought-resister, flourishes, yielding plentiful, choice hay. It yields more tons to the acre than any other forage crop—three to ten tons per acre. First cutting fifty to sixty days after planting. Additional cutting every thirty to forty days till frost kills dead.

Pay for Your Seed With Note

If you will plant ten acres to Sudan Grass I will supply you with a liberal quantity of seed and accept your four months' note for $20 in settlement for the seed.

How to Pay for Seed With Hay

If you will plant forty acres of more, I will supply a liberal quantity of seed for planting at the rate of $15 an acre, accepting your four months' note in settlement. Or, if you prefer, I will take hay at $10 a ton for the seed, at $15.00 a ton, delivered at your nearest railroad station.

The Agricultural Department has recently published a bulletin on the best forage crop known as the biggest grower of Sudan Grass in America, and I believe it will bring millions of dollars to the farmer. Write for this bulletin, addressing the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., requesting the bulletin on SUDAN GRASS—THE NEW CULTIVATION. It gives you the information you should have. I will send it free if you will ask for it.

I will also sell ship in of the best grade of Sudan Grass, a certificate of inspection by the State Experiment Station, guaranteeing its purity and freedom from all other seeds, for 10c per lb. and actual freight charges.

If you prefer to pay cash for your seed, I will make a discount of 5 per cent providing payment is made within five days of receipt.

Please write me at once, stating how you will pay cash or give a note. If the latter, then give me your shipping point, the number of acres you will put in Sudan Grass, and give references—your bank or two settlements, and I will ship you the seed. Don't delay, for the demand will be great. Act quickly. Planting time is on us, and I want to get your order in at once.

WOMEN IN SUPREME CONTROL

Customs In Malabar Are Described by One of the Most Prominent Chiefs and Lawgivers.

Sir Chotter Sankaran Nair, a great Indian chief and lawyer from Madras, recently opened the eyes of his audience at the London School of Economics by explaining the advance of the Orient over the Occident in Malabar. There women rule, the matriarchal system of the Nairs of Malabar being, in his opinion, an example for the world.

"Agitation," he said, "is now going on in this country for a system which has already been recognized in my country and which the British courts of justice have always taken into consideration.

"While social marriages did not exist among royal or ruling families in Malabar, the public or lower classes of Nairs are duly married. Religio-ceremonies are unknown, but the astrologers consult the horoscopes of the parties, and, as a rule, the unions remain permanent."

Where the women came in, he said, was that they were the mistresses in his wife's name and the property was completely under her control. The husband went to the wife's home and was fed and maintained there. He only went home on leave, occasionally. That was the method of the upper classes. The wives of the upper castes under which there were really two families, and the third type was that in which a husband found a home for his wife in his own house. These three systems had prevailed for about 1,000 years. There was no dowry in Malabar. The wife shared her husband's property, and had complete control of her own. All property was vested in the women.

Time's Here to Swat the Fly

HOUSE FLIES carry disease from one place to another. That this has been proved scientifically. And now it remains to prevent these insects, or to reduce their numbers in the community, that the diseases they carry may be reduced also or even abolished. One method of dealing with disease-bearing insects is to trap and kill as many as we can. For this reason "kill the fly" or "swat that fly" campaigns have been instituted in many places. But it has been found by experiment that we cannot hope to kill sufficient flies to reduce seriously their total numbers. This is because flies breed at a very great rate when the weather is warm, and they lay their eggs in such a way that the total numbers which we can kill is so small, when compared to the total numbers born, that the results for the most part have been disappointing.

All any efforts should be directed at preventing house flies from breeding—for prevention is better than cure. The best way to do this is to observe strict cleanliness—municipal cleanliness and home cleanliness. Then these insects will desert the dirty places, the swarms of flies they convey will vanish. This was the policy pursued on the Rhine during the months of occupation by Italy and yellow fever, which are conveyed from one person to another by mosquitoes. The method was most successful.

The house fly breeds in filth. Each female fly, as soon as she is mature, lays her eggs, about 150 eggs on collections of manure, decomposing garbage, stagnant rubbish or house refuse, and the eggs hatch into tiny maggots. After five days have passed, each maggot becomes a rolled up, brown-shaped chrysalis, and after another five days each chrysalis gives birth to a two-winged, ill-tempered fly, which is ready for business from the time it leaves the house fly. Bluebottles breed similarly, but instead of laying their eggs on rotting carcasses or decaying animal matter. The house fly and the lesser house fly course disease by bathing their legs in germ-laden material, which they find during their feeding forays. The germs attach to their legs and to the line of their telescopic proboscides, and then are carried to the milk jug, the teacup, to the cut loaf, and to the culinary utensils. Sometimes the flies swallow the germs, which multiply inside them, and afterwards the concentrated disease focus is again deposited wherever the fly settles.

We can be rid of flies if we observe the ordinary common sense rules of cleanliness and sanitation. No fly-bins, or breeding places, must be permitted near human habitations. All such places must be made clean regularly once a week by the sanitary or municipal authorities, and then the fly maggots will be unable to come to maturity, and so will not be contaminated. Recently a war on flies has been taken up assiduously by the press and the medical officers of health are exerting themselves to start the campaigns.

Thus the municipal authorities have made a start, and it remains for the individual householder to help them. Each one of us can do our share of fly prevention. We can prevent flies in our own homes. On one morning, every week, we must inspect our own premises. Flies breed in kitchen. Observe every nook of the scullery, the pantry, the cellar; open the kitchen range and see that every corner and cranny is scrupulously clean. Next, we must examine the dustbin to see if it is properly covered. Let there be no small collections of rotting vegetable matter. If or rotting peelings or scraps of bread, or any other places where flies can breed. Let the cheese be well covered, and the bread be in its pan, and all food within its larder in its proper place, and let everything be clean and wholesome.

It is most important, also, to inform our neighbors on every convenient occasion of the disgusting and dangerous character of house flies, and to ask them to cooperate in preventing them. Then there will be an organized campaign against these insects. The more we talk about it the sooner will the thing be done. The education of children in the matter is also most essential. Then a new generation will grow up knowing the dangers of fly-breeding, and the grievous Schoolmasters and schoolmistresses should be invited to teach their charges about flies, and should set the example in keeping their rooms free of school cleanliness. This will help us greatly. If we all keep our own premises clean, and our children's flies will be spared the horrors of summer sickness, typhoid will be lessened, diarrhoea will be reduced, and the health of the community will be improved enormously. With regard to house flies and dysentery diseases the remedy is simple. Let us apply it.

As a result of experiments the specialists of the United States department of agriculture have discovered that a small amount of ordinary borax sprinkled daily on manure will effectively prevent the breeding of the typhoid or house fly. Similarly, the same substance applied to garbage, refuse, open toilets, damp floors and crevices in stables, cellars or markets, will prevent fly eggs from hatching. Borax will not kill the adult fly nor prevent it from laying eggs, but its thorough use will prevent any further breeding. The investigation, which included experiments with many substances, was undertaken to discover some means of preventing the breeding of flies in horse manure without lessening the value of this manure as a fertilizer for use by the farmer. It was felt that if some means of preventing the breeding of flies over a human habitation could be devised, the diseases spread by these filthy germ carriers could be greatly reduced. While the "swat the fly campaign," traps and other devices for reducing the number of typhoid-carrying flies are useful, they are of less importance than the prevention of the breeding. It has been explained that the best means for preventing the breeding of flies would come into operation on the farm. Every fly on the farm could be put to his manure pile without destroying its usefulness for growing plants, and without introducing into the soil any substance that would interfere with his crops.

As a result of experiments carried on at the Arkansas farm, in Virginia, and New Orleans, La., the investigators found that 0.62 of a pound of borax, or 0.75 of a pound of calcined colemanite (a calcium borate) would kill the maggots and prevent practically all of the flies ordinarily breeding in eight bushels of horse manure from developing. This was proved by placing manure in cages and comparing the results from piles treated with borax and with colemanite. The borax, it was found, killed the fly eggs and maggots in the manure and prevented their growth into flies.

In the case of garbage cans or refuse piles, 0.75 ounce of calcined colemanite, ranging from five cents a pound upward, according to the quantity which is purchased, will effectually prevent flies from breeding.

While it can be safely stated that no injurious action has followed the application of manure treated with borax at the rate of .62 pounds for every bushelful, or ever larger amounts in the case of some plants, nevertheless borax-treated manure has not been studied in connection with the growth of all crops, and its comparative effect has been determined. It is therefore recommended that not more than 10 lbs. of the borax-treated manure should be applied per acre to the field. As truck growers are considerably more than this amount, it is suggested that all cars containing borax-treated manure be so marked, and that public health officials stipulate in their directions for this treatment that not over 42 (42-100) of a pound for eight bushels of manure be used, as it has been shown that larger amounts of borax will injure most plants. It is also recommended that all public health officials and others in recommending borax treatment for killing fly eggs and "spots in manure be warned by public against the injurious effects of large amounts of borax on the growth of plants. Purchasers of manure produced in cities during the fly-breeding season should insist that the dealers from whom they purchase give them a certified statement as to whether or not the manure is free from borax, and if borax is used the purchaser has been treated with boraxs.

In feeding to hogs garbage that contains borax care is also recommended, especially when the quantity of borax is large. Borax is not a very poisonous substance and the feeding of garbage that contains it to hogs is not likely to be a serious matter. On the other hand, borax in large quantities does produce gastric disturbances and the use of this reason a certain amount of care is advisable.

The method for using this substance in the case of stables is to sprinkle the borax or colemanite in the quantities given above, by means of a flour sifter or other fine sieve, around the outer edges of the floor of horse manure. The manure should then be sprinkled immediately with two or three gallons of water to eight bushels of manure. It is essential, however, to sprinkle a little of the borax on the manure as it is carried daily to the pile, instead of waiting until a full pile is obtained, because this will prevent the eggs when the flies lay on fresh manure from hatching, as the fly maggots congregate at the outer edge of the manure pile, most of the borax should be sprinkled there.

Borax costs two to six cents per pound in 100-pound lots in Washington, and it is estimated that at this rate it would cost only one cent per horse per day to prevent all breeding of flies in city stables. If calcined colemanite is purchased in large shipments this cost should be considerably less. At the same time, if the borax is used on the manure only in the proportions stated, its value for use in the garden or for sale to farmers will not be lessened.

In view of this discovery there now seems little excuse for any horse owner or resident of a city allowing typhoid flies to breed in his stable or garbage can.

It is believed that this information will greatly help the health authorities in their campaign against the typhoid fly. The health authorities have long tried to prevent the breeding of flies in city stables, through the use of iron sulphate as a larvacide. In the case of iron sulphate, however, a large amount is required, and other insecticides, such as paris green or potassium cyanide, while effective in killing flies, are very expensive or extremely poisonous. Borax, which is used freely in most households, and is readily available in all parts of the country, has the advantage of being comparatively nonpoisonous and nonflammable, readily soluble in water and easy to handle. It can be purchased at retail for ten cents a pound, and a single pound used as directed is a garbage pail or open toilet may prevent the breeding of hundreds of dangerous flies.

The Road to Unity

By REV. L. W. CORNILL
Assistant to the Dean, Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

TEXT—With all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.—Ephesians 4:1, 3.

Much is said today of church unity. In some minds, apparently, the great one organization, Christ's words in John 17:21 are quoted frequently. That they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me." But it may be pointed out that during the middle ages the ideal of unity was almost realized, yet the results which our Lord said would flow from real oneness were far from being realized. We conclude, therefore, that Christ spoke of a unity of another kind, and we believe it set forth in our text as "the unity of the spirit." Furthermore, this is a condition which does not have to be produced, but which we are to "keep." Already, the truly regenerate are one in Christ, being baptized by the Spirit into the body of which our Lord is the head. But this oneness is to be realized in a continuity of feeling and purpose. This realization would certainly go away with some of the outward divisions among Christians, but the point of insistence is the inward unity.

Needful Graces.

Several graces are mentioned in the text which will greatly assist towards the goal of unity.

"Lowliness" comes first. This is a distinctively Christian grace, for while the pagans recognized it as right when endowed, they felt it was not good in itself. But our very exaltation in Christ is to begin in the lowly spirit; the apostle has just been speaking of our high calling when he comes to exhort us to lowliness. Drummond says that "lowliness is council with a high purpose." It is a stepping-stone to unity, then, to lowliness.

Next comes "meekness." This is submission both to God and men, grounded in humility of spirit. Meekness does not press its claims, yet is a most powerful grace. Pounding at icebergs with mighty hammers leaves it undiminished, but a warm current surely dissolves it; so the soft answer turns away wrath. What a lubricant for the wheels of church life is meekness!

But meekness is to be not only meek but "long-suffering." This is long mildeness, as opposed to "short temper." It is akin to the unvaryingness of God.

"Forbearing one another in love." This is an extension of meekness to suffering, allowing for the frailties and mistakes of others, even when they wound us. This can be done because we wish them well and love them. This grace enables us to take sides even against ourselves, and we shall need it, even in dealing with Christians, for not all of these are perfect!

The Quaker and the Organ.

The value of this grace in the development of unity is illustrated in a quaint incident. Some years ago it was proposed to purchase an organ for a friend meeting-house in a certain town in Ohio. This was strongly opposed by an elder, a leader, for the use of musical instruments was not so common among the Friends as it is today. In spite of his opposition, however, the organ was installed. The old man did not stay away from meeting, but the organ was evidently a great cross to him. Finally, the minister called upon him and this following conversation took place:

"Friend," said the minister, "thee seems grieved at the organ in the meeting."

"Yes," said the old man, "I am."

"Well," continued the minister, "if thee feels that way about it, I will take the organ out of the meeting house with my own hands."

"No, no," demurred the old man, "if thee feels that way about it, let it stay."

Workers Under George Mueller.

The proper maintenance of unity is well illustrated in the work of George Mueller, founder of the orphanage at Bristol, England. Representatives of all the evangelical churches were found in his large force of teachers, yet a beautiful spirit of unity prevailed. Mr. Mueller tells us that when he first saw certain traits he was disposed to stand aloof from those who saw them not. But this did not result in peace and joy, and he soon came to a better mind, for he recalled that one by God's grace was to grow to use truth. He felt that true Christians should walk in love and the only point upon which he insisted as a ground of fellowship was that they should belong to the Lord, holding fast the Son of God. He felt that many of the wrong, and more blameworthy, more obedience, would lead to fuller agreement, and that the unity of mind which will obtain in heaven may be anticipated even now. Meanwhile, we would not make agreement upon particular points of truth the basis of union, although it is to be emphasized that he was unbending in his insistence upon truth as God gave him to see it. Its neither sectarian nor loose nor unnecessarily sacrificed unity to fidelity to truth. May his spirit of wisdom and love be our!

THE GROWTH OF WESTERN CANADA

Increase in Railway Mileage, School Attendance and Population.

Some idea of the extent of railway construction in Western Canada can be derived from the fact that the railway mileage in the Province of Alberta has been doubled in three years. The present mileage is 4,907. In all of the settled districts there is ample railway privileges. The rates are governed by a Dominion Railway Commission, and in the exercise of their powers they not only control the rates, giving fair equality to both railway and shipper, but from a court to hear complaints of any who may desire to lodge the same.

In the matter of education no better instance of the advancement that it has made can be given than that found in the information to hand that attendance at the University of Alberta has increased 1,000 per cent in five years. We now have one representative of all settled portions of the Province. The students in attendance are fairly distributed in districts.

Then as to the prosperity which follows residence in Western Canada, J. E. Edwards of Dutchie, Alta., gives a wonderful testimony. He writes, "In the spring of 1907 I first came to this Country and located on a quarter section of land near Dutchie. I therefore here I have been engaged in mixed farming, which I have found to be personally satisfactory and profitably lived. On coming here my worldly fortune was small, besides having a family to care for. I now own three hundred and twenty acres of land, twenty head of horses and forty head of hogs, without encumbrance.

"During the seven years I have not had a crop fail. My best crop of oats averaged 100 bushels per acre, and a general yield of thirty-five bushels and upward. My best wheat crop averaged forty-three bushels per acre. When I have had smaller yields per acre I have found that it has been due to improper cultivation. The winters here, although at times the weather is cold, I find as a whole are very agreeable. The summers are warm, but not sultry. The summer nights are cool and one is always assured of a good night's rest. My health has been much better, as I do not suffer from asthma since coming to this country. I have no land for sale, and am not working to make any change, but may be pleased to answer any enquiries concerning this locality."—Advertisement.

DANGER IN CLOSE ALLIANCES

Investigation Has Shown That Cancer is Most Prevalent When Cousins Are Wedded.

Speaking of the possible hereditary tendency to cancer, Dr. Charles P. Davenport of the eugenics department of Cold Spring Harbor, N. Y., says for a record of the ancestors of cancer for at least the last three generations, the highest in Maine: "I have no doubt that this is due to the fact that there is more race in Maine which are nonimmune to cancer."

Doctor Davenport's studies "indicate that resistance to cancer is a positive (dominant) trait and that nonresistance appears in children only when both parents belong to a nonresistant race. And this result is commonest, by other things being equal, where cousin marriages are commonest, because that makes it probable that if one parent belongs to a cancer race, the other—the cousin—will belong to the same cancer race. Now, in rural Maine cousin marriages are relatively frequent, especially in the islands off the coast, and here we have the conditions for the rearing in large numbers of numbers of the cancer race to an inbred community."

Making War Impossible.

"I shall yet succeed," said the inventor, "in producing a weapon so deadly that war must cease."

"I shouldn't be surprised," replied Miss Cayenne. "A few more engines of destruction may kill off people now there won't be enough to conduct a battle."

MOVE NOT POPULAR

Objections to Sealed Proposals of Marriage.

Speculations as to Some of the Results if a Proposed New York State Law Should Be Put into Effect.

The attention of all single men and maidens, and of widows also, is directed to a bill introduced into the New York legislature providing that no sermons shall be ordered by the courts unless they have been reduced to writing and signed by the parties. This is a subject worth consideration at all times, but it is especially appropriate at the season when a "young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love."

The purpose of the bill, ostensibly, is to protect men from suits for breach of promise when are, strictly speaking, blackmailing enterprises. But it would serve equally well to protect men whose favorite recreation is to make love to women, and when that has been accomplished, make some other love to some other women. The written proposal of marriage, duly signed, is a material portion of evidence about it, but it is important that all marriageable persons should be well informed of the purpose. It should become a law, and be on their minds, and the rules of the game are to be changed them should be fair notice for the protection of all concerned.

The change would probably reduce the marriage rate to a notable percentage. Some of our bachelor friends have find it easier to propose by letter than face to face, and some girls are little in awe of their affection under the personal magnetism of the charming creature, and are liable to be scared off by the production of a blank form with blanks for the proper return. Even with the request of the girl that they fill it out and sign it while she is communing with her soul whether to add her signature.

When Sir Something Grother proposed to Peg o' My Heart, who had already received matrimonial overtures from two noblemen, she said, "Are you making a proposal of marriage to me?" Whereat the man she was dying to marry sulked off to the window and looked gloomily into the river, and the alarmed girl unbraided herself for her folly in talking too much.

In this case the man had to get over his alarm at the gross, open and palpable manner of the transaction, because the play could not have gone on otherwise; but many a proposal of the stage has been permanently wrecked by the injection of too much formality into the affair. Be it usually described by others than the participants as a proposal, material loss when a good catch gets away from her. The suit for breach of promise is an anachronism.—Philadelphia Ledger.

RACE SUICIDE LAID TO GIRLS' COLLEGES

Coeducation Is Urged as the More Desirable Course.

A famous Georgia college for women in the United States should be closed and all girls should be sent to coeducational institutions, according to Professors Howell Johnson and Bertha J. Stoermann of the University of Pittsburgh.

This conclusion is based on the claims that women's colleges contribute largely to race suicide among the best elements of the American population.

In support of this contention the records of Wellesley college have been analyzed and the results published in the Journal of Heredity, the organ of the American Genetic association of this city.

Of 1,000 Wellesley graduates, 1,000 years after graduation fewer than one-half of the girls were married. These have borne only one and one-half children from each.

Taking all the students into account and allowing enough time to elapse so that it is probable they will bear no more children, the investigators have found that the Wellesley girls couple no less than one child each to the mother than do the men who have made their own number. And the men of America, who from a cosmic point of view are assumed to be the pick of the lot, do only about a third as well as the girls.

To maintain a stationary population the women actually every married woman should bear four children. From this point of view other believe that the institutions of the country are blameless in the matter of the race's decline.

The women are blamed for failing to give girls an opportunity to meet young men and for failure to make them desirous or competent to be wives and mothers. It is shown statistically that the marriage rate of "coeds" is considerably better, and it is remarked that at Wellesley the students are forbidden to receive men callers even on Sunday afternoons or evenings.

Viewed as to marriageability, the institutions consider a woman more attractive during her college years, and more desirous of vital importance that young men should be allowed to meet her in that period.

NO BOOZE TO INDIANS.

California Law Forbids Sale to Any of Them.

Sacramento, Cal.—It is made illegal to sell intoxicating liquors to "squaw men" or any one who lives or sleeps with Indians and to any person of part Indian blood under a bill by Assemblyman Phelps just signed by Governor Johnson.

The bill aims to end an asserted practice of white persons purchasing liquor to carry into the camps and villages of Indians in the remote mountain districts.

Literary Inspiration.

It is common to sum and score anybody to have a hot thought come crashing into his brain and pierce to those parallel rule where the wagon trains of common sense roll on jogging along in ruts regular sequence of association. A little convention bite me like a insect in the forehead. I have often had the blood drop from my cheeks when it struck and felt that I missed an waste as death. Then comes a creeping as of centipedes running down the spine, then a sudden flush and a beating in the vessels of the head, then a long sigh and the poem is written.—Holmes.

Sad Camels.

It is a well established fact that even young camels never play. They are born sad, and therefore their life is one protest against being made to work, although work has been their portion since the beginning of the memory of man. Has largely they have been domesticated from the early dawn of history. Even from the manger that Job possessed 6,000 camels.—London Opinion.

The Clock Was All Right.

A man went into a clock store and handed out the pendulum of a clock, which he wished to have for repairs. The clockman asked him why he didn't bring the whole clock.

"The clock is all right," was the reply. "It's the pendulum that won't go. As soon as I pulled that out the clock went the very minute."—Judge.

SELF RELIANCE.

The man who is self reliant seeks ever to discover and conquer the weakness within him that keeps him from attaining what he holds desirous. He seeks within himself the power to battle against all outside influences. He realizes that all the greatest men in history have been those who have had to fight against poverty, suffering, sorrow or pain, and he sees no cause for despair though a tunnel is to a traveler. He knows he must remove some into the sunlight.—Elbert Hubbard.

JOSEPH F. SHEENAN

FAMOUS STAR WITH THE SHEEHAN OPERA CO. GIVES WARNING TO VOCAL STUDENTS.

There are few people in this country today more qualified, from a standpoint of experience, to advise ambitious vocal students, particularly girls, than Joseph F. Sheehan, of the Sheehan Opera Company, which comes to the Charlevoix Theatre on Wednesday evening, June 30, as a result of an open date in the booking, in a magnificent presentation of the famous success, "Cleopatra and Cavalleria Rusticana."

Mr. Sheehan says: "The pity of it. I have been requested to explain why, with many engaged in vocal study, so few attain anything like success. Studios are filled with aspirants who spend time and money, to say nothing of nervous energy in striving for the artistic goal, and the question arises why so few succeed. I'll tell you in one sentence, not ten per cent of students have any just reason for aspiring to vocal eminence, and ten per cent is a liberal estimate, and here is another reason, it may seem brutal, but it is a deplorable fact, not twenty-five per cent of those who give vocal instruction are qualified to teach art correctly. There is more chicanery and humbug in voice teaching, than in all the other departments of the profession combined. It is for this reason that there ought to be laws prohibiting the incompetent from ruining voices and blasting hopes. Not a week passes but what I hear a number of girls sing who are studying for the operatic stage, most of them could not become artists if they studied a lifetime.

I presume what I have said will cause excitement in some circles, but it is the truth nevertheless. If you don't believe it, listen at some of the vocal studio doors and hear some of the wailing that is supposed to eventuate in vocal supremacy, but which in certain instances is financial and vocal disasters.

LOST MEMORY AND ENLISTED.

Fracture of Jaw in Ball Game Brought Bailey to Himself.

Toronto, Ont.—Dan Bailey, twenty, son of Professor George Bailey of Clarenville, N. I., who while suffering from loss of memory enlisted in the Royal Canadian dragoons here on March 11 last under another name, has recovered his memory. He walked into police headquarters and was so affected by what he heard that efforts made to find him that he had to be sent to the hospital barracks.

Bailey, who is a graduate of Syracuse university, received a shock from lightning and fell forty feet while engaged in tree surgery in Ontario. He disappeared within an hour on his way to see a Syracuse physician. Partial recovery of his memory followed a week after he resulted from the shock of a fractured jaw received in a baseball game at Clarenville, nearly two weeks ago. He has no recollection of having enlisted and it is not will be discharged.

OUT EMPTY, BACK FULL

Bottle Dropped in Nile Came Back Full of Rum.

Virginia, Minn.—A. B. Costes, a well known mining man, got a surprise he the anyone the other day. It was a bottle of whisky from a Kentucky distillery that he had not ordered.

The odd thing about the gift was that the liquor was in a metal container. Costes emptied with a party of friends while steaming down the river Nile in Africa, about a year ago and threw into the murky stream.

In the bottle he had placed a slip of paper bearing his name and address. Some one found the bottle and fished it out of the distillery, where it was filled and sent to Mr. Costes with the liquor factory's compliments. The original bottle was presented to Mr. Costes by a local friend who had started on his African trip.

The average boy ought to have, and usually does have, an appetite like an ostrich. Three points to remember are: Don't eat too much—most healthy boys do. Mr. Bridge was compelled to guarantee a large sum to secure the appearance of the company in this city. He did not sign the contracts however until after having conferred with numerous local playgoers. Mr. Bridge states that by special arrangements a popular price scale will be effective here.

"CABIRIA" LEADS THE WAY

The widely heralded photo spectacle "Cabiria" from a scenario by Gabriele D'Annunzio, Italy's foremost poet and dramatist, will be shown at the Bijou Theatre on Monday, June 28, is one of the most interesting novelties of the times. This picture was made by the Itala Film Company of Turin and the American tour is under the personal direction of Louis F. Werba and Mark A. Luescher, who heretofore have directed and produced high class musical comedies exclusively.

"Cabiria" is said to have been staged in five countries at an outlay of $500,000 with a cast of five thousand, and it will demonstrate a new and important function of the camera. An expenditure such as this and the payment of royalty such as D'Annunzio demands would never have been possible if it were to have been seen only by the people of Italy. But in "Cabiria" the producers created a motion tableaux for the world and the picture machine makes it possible to show the colossal spectacle everywhere. It points out remarkable possibilities, as performances which have hitherto been confined to one place, to which the multitude—and to travel, such as the Oberammergau production, or the notable presentation of Jean d'Arc by Maude Adams, at the Cambridge stadium, can in this way be done with unlimited expenditure and then given to the entire world, through the medium of the camera, to see and enjoy.

COMMON COUNCIL

At the council meeting Monday night the State street sewer resolution was passed. This ordinance provides for the emptying of the Mason, Clinton St. and Park avenue sewers into the State St., sewer instead of into the Bridge Street sewer as at present.

Mayor and Clerk were instructed to sell the Lewis street and Petoskey Avenue bonds amounting to $1,200.

An ordinance defining the powers and duties of the board of cemetery trustees was passed.

Ordered that bridge railing be painted away the same color as the bridge, lamp posts to be painted pearl gray.

Ark lights ordered to be burned until 2:00 a. m. instead of midnight.

Cement walk ordered at Elmer Mayne property on Dixon avenue.

Northern Michigan

Northern Michigan Odd Fellows will gather at Harbor Springs July 5th for their first annual Emmet county picnic and field day. The occasion will also be the official Independence day celebration of Emmet county, and will be largely attended.

Traverse City Special: While in the city today Charles A. Donlin, general freight agent of the Northern Michigan Transportation company, stated that his company is negotiating for the purchase of the steamer Mackinac which, if the purchase is consummated will soon be placed on the route between Charlevoix and Traverse City during the present season. The boat will make stops at all bay points.

M. W. Merrill of Williamsburg killed a genuine copperhead snake on his farm which measured twenty-two inches in length. This is the first specimen of this variety of snakes that has been found in this region in the last twenty years and it was supposed that the species had become extinct. The fangs of the reptile were a quarter of an inch in length and it required a real battle before it was dispatched.

According to the Alpena News there is but little doubt but what the White road will be completed into Alpena in the early part of the coming October. This was the substance of a statement made by L. H. Withey, president of the Michigan Trust Company, receiver for the White road, to a number of Alpena business men who went to Grand Rapids last week to exert influence with the trust company to complete the line into Alpena.

Traverse City Record: Charles A. Donlin, assistant general freight agent of the Northern Michigan Transportation company, is in the city today to size up prospects for freight and passenger business if a boat be put on connecting link between Traverse City and Chicago. The company is negotiating for the steamer Mackinac, and the proposition materializes there will be three trips weekly, with stops at Old Mission, Northport, Bowers Harbor and other points along the bay.

The number of black bears in Wexford county, and there are several, was decreased one Thursday when a party of hunters shot one near the farm of Chas. Barrett, near Ash siding. The bear had visited farmers in that section for several weeks and had killed several small sheep. Clam Lake township, in which Cadillac is located, has a bear which is being eagerly sought by hunters. This particular animal is reported to have picked up a small sheep of the Lood farm recently and was making away with it when discovered and chased. In its flight the bear dropped its prey.

Petoskey News: The Ives Marquette spring an agreeable surprise Thursday morning when the announcement came from headquarters in Detroit that the motor car service between Petoskey and Charlevoix would be put in full operation Saturday of this week. It had been planned by this road to give a part of the service commencing Sunday and to put on the rest later in July. This has now been changed and the motor car will leave Petoskey daily as follows: 11:00 o'clock in the forenoon and 2:40, 5:30 and 9:40 o'clock in the afternoon. The car will leave Harbor Springs in the afternoon as follows: 1:35, 3:25, 7:00 and 10:30 o'clock. The regular passenger trains out on this road and to from Charlevoix gives additional service on which the suburban tickets will be accepted and make quite an agreeable service between the two resorts of Petoskey and Charlevoix.

Traverse City Record: Edward Clark, claiming to be from Charlevoix, has indulged in an auto trip to Charlevoix for which he will pay about thirty dollars in cash or labor. Last Monday he hired an auto from a local livery to take him to Charlevoix, the price agreed upon being $12.00. When he got there he sent the man back without paying him and later showed no disposition of ever wanting to pay. Sheriff Campbell went after him and brought him here. He was assigned before Justice Curtis this morning and admitted his guilt. Sentence has been deferred because he claimed to be able to raise the money. It will be a case of put up or be shut up.

A change in the method of exhibits was adopted by the directors of the Western Michigan Development bureau recently. Formerly a few large exhibits were made at the State Fair, West Michigan fair, Ohio & Michigan land show. This year it is laid out this coming fall and winter is to send the winter apple exhibits to 75 or 100 towns and cities in Indiana, Ohio, Illinois and Southern Michigan. These will be on a much smaller scale than the show displays and will be shown in the windows of the leading stores in the various cities. In this way the Western Michigan fruit will be advertised over a far wider area and will be more carefully and systematically placed before the people.

Petoskey News: Boyne City is planning to get some of Petoskey's trade from the summer people on Walloon Lake. A fine stone road will probably be constructed soon from Boyne City to Walloon Lake in an effort to turn the automobile traffic in that direction. Boyne City is considerable nearer. Walloon Lake than is Petoskey but of course does not have the train service. The merchants there figure that with a good highway people will bring their automobiles and will go in their to Boyne City rather than come by train to Petoskey. The city will have to get busy and have the road to Walloon Lake improved so as to land off the most planned by Boyne City. With just as good a road leading to Petoskey, Boyne City would be left in the darkness for there is not a summer man on Walloon Lake who would not rather come to Petoskey where he has the benefit of the larger fine stores.

SKATING RINK CHANGES HANDS

Ed Seaman has bought the Karstake roller rink on Bishopsee avenue and has taken possession. The rink will be under the management of Mr. Jack Futch, of Petoskey. Mr. Futch is a well known racing and trick skater, and with Allie Moore in town for the summer, and when Mr. Futch recognizes as a star skater, we may expect some exciting events at the rink.

The rink opened for the season last Monday night with a good start. A splendid orchestrion, the equivalent of a full orchestra, is installed, and good music is assured.

Mr. Seaman wants the public to understand that people of doubtful character will be strictly excluded from the rink, as he wishes to cater to the best people only.

There will be a fruit shortage throughout the country this year according to the reports that are being sent out from the producing sections of the country and this condition will result in great benefit to the Grand Traverse region which will have a fair crop of all varieties, according to present indications. The scarcity of fruit in other sections will naturally raise the price to the benefit of the growers here who have a quantity to sell.

Harry Nicholls' residence on Dixon avenue caught fire in the roof on Tuesday afternoon. Just by chance Mrs. Nicholls went to the garret after something when she discovered smoke. The alarm was sent in and the entire department outfit was there in ten minutes. Only a small space in the roof was burned and considerable water was used to soon extinguished it. Damage slight. A spark from the saw mill smoke stack is supposed to have done the work.

Dr. Barney & Mitchell is the name of a new dental firm in Charlevoix. The junior member of the firm is none other than Dr. Wm. W. Mitchell, son of Mr. and Mrs. John Mitchell, of this city, who was graduated in dentistry from the University of Michigan in June, another Charlevoix boy who has made good, a Charlevoix high school graduate and an all-round fine chap. The dental rooms are at Dr. Barney's old stand, and the enlargement of the equipment has been installed to meet evident requirements. Dr. Mitchell already has his coat off.

The prettiest, cleanest, and one of best commended coast guard stations on fresh water is that of Charlevoix. In the enforcement of the rigid discipline of the service there is a conspicuous example of that rare quality in a commander—the blending of kindness with firmness. The men literally "swear by" their chief, and actually fall over each other to respond to even a glance from the "old man." Every man is inspired with a sense of duty, and a justifiable pride in the service. It is quite a suburban village, that settlement down at the piers, with neat, pleasant houses and an atmosphere of contentment. Every morning at sunrise and every evening at sunset, the crew stands at "attention" for "colors," when Old Glory is broken loose or furled.

The summer force at the postoffice is now on duty—six clerks and four carriers.

Miss Anna E. Slaght, of Grand Rapids, is here visiting her brother, Fred Slaght.

Clarence Hazelnow has been appointed to fill a temporary vacancy in the local coast guard crew.

Former Governors Harmon of Ohio and Tifer of Illinois are at their Charlevoix cottages for the summer.

The Sheehan Opera Co. will be one of the best attractions in Charlevoix this season. At the Charlevoix Theatre to-night.

Mrs. W. J. Bachus returned from LaCrosse, Wis., on Tuesday, where she had been visiting her sister for several weeks.

In observance of July Fourth, a legal holiday, the banks will be closed all day on Monday, July 5th. Customers doing change or otherwise please note, and arrange for same on Saturday.

Dr. J. E. Calden V. S., of East Jordan, was called by Dr. D. F. Sommers, V. S., Wednesday of last week, and assisted in a difficult but successful operation on a horse owned by Arthur Beattie, of Marion.

Forrest Morris, a farmer of Marion township, was brought to Dr. Winnison's office Saturday in one of the dairy delivery automobiles with a very serious injury. He was struck by the fore foot of a vicious broncho, breaking his left thigh bone close to the hip. The fracture was reduced and he returned home. The injury will lay him up probably the remainder of the summer.

The Charlevoix fishermen who, a few years ago, succumbed to the bite of the salt water microbe,—otherwise known as the Gloucester fever, are about all back and mighty glad to get back. There are but two or three yet remaining in the historic old fishing town, one of whom, John Dahlmer,—is said to "be down and out." Moral: Stick to good old Charlevoix and fresh water.

Miss Marie Barney, who is visiting at the home of her brother, Dr. W. E. Barney, has been doing post-graduate work at the Detroit Conservatory all through the winter, preparatory to her twenty-five weeks' concert tour upon which she starts October 18th, under the management of the Midland Lyceum bureau. She will be in Charlevoix all summer and will give vocal lessons during her stay.

Pearl Pearson, who was the No. 1 man in the Pentwater coast guard station, has been appointed keeper of Beaver Island station and went to the island Monday. Capt. Pearson succeeds Capt. Stebbins, who has been transferred to the station at Sheboygan, Wis. The department is just now wrestling with the question of securing additional land at the "point" upon which to erect new and larger buildings.

It is a nice, clean-cut bunch of boys that has come out of the Michigan University. In this month of June they graduated and carve a career. The last one called to our attention is Fred C. Mayne, son of Judge Mayne. Fred took the degree of Bachelor of Science two years ago, and this year came out with his M. S. parchment. The young man is entering Harper Hospital, Detroit, as an "externe," which means a two years post graduate course in clinics, as an assistant practitioner. The boy who can reap such scholastic honors has the "stuff" in him which is a guaranty of professional success.

U. S. Coast Guard cutter Algonquin entered this port from Chicago Monday morning, remaining all day. On board as a guest of Capt. Bill was Archie Parmelee, son of Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Parmelee, of San Diego, Calif., and a grandson of Hon. A. Parmelee and Mrs. H. P. Parmelee, of this city. Capt. Bill, of the Tuscarora, finished his three years tour of duty on the Pacific coast last fall, with headquarters at San Diego. During that time he became an intimate friend of Mr. and Mrs. Parmelee, whose eldest son is an Ensign in the U. S. navy. Archie, on his trip east, naturally reported to Capt. Bill, who took him aboard for the north trip. The young man will remain until August first.

The Rabbinical Conference.

The twenty-sixth annual session of the Central Conference of American Rabbis is being held at the Inn, with an attendance of seventy-five, and more coming, of the most distinguished of the Jewish clergymen of the country. The session opened Wednesday morning with the address of the president, which ably reviewed the work of the year. The Conference will continue until Tuesday afternoon, and a program of large scope will be followed.

THIRTY-FOURTH ANNUAL OLD SETTLERS MEETING

Old Mission Meeting Scored Big Success — Benzonia Next Year.

Traverse City Record

Historic Old Mission was in gala attire Wednesday to welcome the thirty-fourth annual meeting of the Old Settler's association. The threatening clouds which promised rain early in the morning cleared as the day advanced, and brilliant sunshine added its cheer to the pleasant occasion.

Fully one hundred autos, filled to their capacity, left Traverse City during the morning bound for the scene of the picnic. While no regular procession was feasible, the stream of cars along both the shore and center roads of the Peninsula was constant for a couple of hours. The recent rains had laid the dust, and "the garden spot of the Grand Traverse region," bedecked in all its prettiness of flower and luxuriant foliage, made the drive one to be remembered.

An ideal place for the picnic had been chosen in the large grove near the hall grounds. There tents had been erected where members of the association might register and receive badges. The latter bore the picture of Wm. Marshall, one of the pioneers of Old Mission, a unanimous choice in calling attention to the advantages of the region in the early days of its history. At the registration tables presided over by the three assistant secretaries, Mrs. Alma Thompson, Miss Nettie Gray and Miss Clara Moore, were also to be found copies of printed matter of interest to association members. Here might be obtained the report of the Historian, Mrs. Wm. Love; pictures of twelve pioneers of the region photographed by S. E. Wait in 1907; a circular presented by Will S. Anderson, secretary, containing pictures of seventy men instrumental in the development of the region, Lewis Miller too first white man of Grand Traverse, and Traverse City forty years ago. In this tent were also many photographs.

The program concluded with the business of electing officers and choosing a place for the next annual meeting. W. L. Case extended an invitation from the people of Benzonia, and J. O. Powers gave a cordial invitation to meet at Elk Rapids. After some discussion Benzonia was the location chosen.

The election of officers resulted in the entire board being re-elected with the exception of president, who is always chosen from the county in which the association holds its annual meeting. The officers and vice-presidents elected are: President, W. L. Case, Benzonia; secretary, Will S. Anderson, Traverse City; historian, Mrs. Wm. Love, Traverse City; historian, Mrs. Wm. Love, Traverse City; treasurer, C. J. Powers, Elk Rapids. Vice presidents: Charlevoix county, C. E. Wilbur; Leelanau county, John Waite; Grand Traverse county, Wm. H. Union; Benzie County, Geo. H. Smith; Emmet county, R. A. Campbell; Kalkaska county, Cornelius Cronin; Antrim county, E. B. Noble. A committee to revise the constitution was appointed, to consist of Mrs. Wm. Love, Will S. Anderson and O. E. Ladd.

At the conclusion of the business, the remainder of the afternoon was spent in a social meeting and general good time. One of the features of the afternoon was a baseball game between the Old Mission boys and the Eclan team from Omena, which was witnessed by hundreds of people.

THE WEST MICHIGAN PIKE ASSOCIATION

On Thursday, July 15, 1915, the West Michigan Pike Association will make their annual tour going north and will stop at Charlevoix at 11:30 a. m. At this time a meeting will be held on the subject of "Good Roads," and some of the good speakers usually carried on the tour will be present. Charlevoix has been accomplished during the past year. It is expected and requested that all the citizens of Charlevoix and vicinity will turn out to this meeting and give the members of the Association a royal welcome.

The Association has just issued its 1915 booklet showing the location of the Pike all the way from Chicago to Mackinac Island. Any motorist may call at the Central Garage, Gomer's Variety Store, the Charlevoix Hotel, Benjamin Brown's Automobile Garage and value them or at either bank and get a copy of the booklet, which is now ready for distribution.

SUCCESS OF A CHARLEVOIX GIRL.

The following concerns the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Harris of Oak Park, Ill. We take it from the Musical News of Chicago:

"Thoroughly enjoyable was the piano recital given in Mr. Arthur B. Fraser's Studio, 310 Wisconsin avenue, Oak Park, on the evening of Wednesday, June 9, when Mr. Fraser presented Elizabeth Harris in a program including the following compositions: "Song of the Bathers," (Paul Wachs); "To a Water Lily" and "In Autumn," (MacDowell); "Minuet," (Paderewski), and" Finale-Sinfonia," (Scotson Clarke). MacDowell's "To a Wild Rose" and Chaminade's "Scarf Dance" were given as encores.

"Miss Harris is only eleven years of age, but it must not be inferred that she is a child prodigy. She impresses one as being just a normal little girl, who has reached quite an advanced state of musical proficiency by faithful endeavor and competent instruction.

"This program was prepared under Mr. Fraser's careful supervision in the last five months, but he shares the credit for its success, with her former teachers, in laying a good foundation. Certain it is that this young pianist evinced with a degree of skill, understanding and poise quite remarkable in one so young. Her touch was dainty and pleasing, her sense of rythm and musical values commendable, and she used no mannerisms whatever. A modesty and gracefulness of manner greatly enhanced the charm of the little lady's performance.

"Mr. Fraser is entirely justified if he is professionally proud of this pupil."

Petoskey Special: One of the oldest Indian women of this region, Mrs. Mary Kewaykondo, and mother of Mrs. Kate Petoskey, is dead here at the age of eighty-seven years. She was a Methodist and Rev. L. H. Manning of the Methodist church here conducted the funeral service. The body was laid at rest near the grave of old Chief Petoskey in Greenwood cemetery.

What Really Happened on FIRST INDEPENDENCE DAY

HOW much that historians have written about the Fourth of July, 1776, an erroneous idea of the happenings of that great day has become a common heritage of the people of our land. Many at the Bicentennial celebration in a part of a patriotic duty to muse upon the imaginative words said "This was the Fourth of July," which some historical writer has painted upon his vision.

In fancy he sees Independence hall in Philadelphia and the Continental congress with its powdered wigs, long coats, knee pants, silk stockings and low shoes stirring with dignity, but blessing spellbound in a wonderfully strange and entirely new document called "The Declaration of Independence."

In fancy he sees bears the popular acclaim of "That is just what we all say" and it is well wished, Mr. Jefferson. Then his mind pictures the various delegates to congress hastening forward, eager for the honor of fixing their signatures to a sheepskin document.

The scene changes to the ringing of the great Liberty bell, to the shouting of the people in Philadelphia who applauded the reading of this bill of rights and to the final closing of the day, with every man, woman and child in Philadelphia happy because he is no longer a British subject, having pictures a free American in a single day.

Such a vision pictures a heroic scene; but the true record of events does not affirm that these so-called happenings taked place on that memorable day. By blotting out the imperfect details of the picture the Fourth of July is in no way robbed of any of its glory.

An authentic account of what transpired at that time changes the meaning of the Fourth of July from one day to about sixty in which the whole history of our nation (there is told of the heroic heartbreaks of the sorely tried colonists are keenly felt.

The day itself properly symbolizes the liberty for which the colonists had fought and stood ready to sacrifice their lives in order to launch the United States as a national craft which should be anchored by no weight of foreign despotism.

It was a time of danger when brother friend and neighbor became estranged by reason of political opinion. Some colonists still loved the mother country with true English pride, while others were so embittered by the injustice of the governing across the seas that they willingly gave their all to the cause of the people of the new land.

During the latter part of 1774 George Washington himself wrote that his thinking man among the colonists wanted to separate from England, and Franklin ridiculed the idea.

During the early days of the revolution the bloodiest battles were of separating from the beloved land of their ancestors. In fact, such a course would have been considered by Americans themselves as treason. Jefferson declared that prior to April 19, 1775, he had heard no whisper of the disposition of anyone to stand from under the governmental power of Great Britain.

The Revolutionary war came with the spring of 1776, when local assemblies began, formal discussion of the liberty of colonies. These legislative bodies possessed but little power, but they did a great part in crystallizing the sentiment for separation. Some of these quarters adhering these opposed to the idea to declare their individual attitude.

The good work of these small legislative bodies was reflected and magnified as soon as the delegates were sent to the Continental congress. Then the spirit of liberty permeated the very atmosphere of the national assembly and many an individual received the courage to allign himself with the cause.

If, June 7, 1776, there had been an "extra paper" to have informed the people of the latest political news one might have read the flaring headlines "Richard Henry Lee of Virginia the Man of the Hour." For it was he who on that day started the Fourth of July. It was this sturdy prayer who introduced the first declaration of independence in congress declaring the American people free.

Good judgment dictated the caution of omitting John Adams' name from the minutes. He was not a man to hide, yet the fact is known today, when there is no array of redcoats waiting to slay patriots as rebels.

Too much praise cannot be given to the introduction of Lee's resolution, yet it was to the credit of the Continental congress that action was not forced upon such an important measure at that time. Not could pity have succeeded with all objections had been silenced, all fears of England's power allayed, until all were conscientiously convinced that the cause of liberty was just. It was imperative that all should hear the Goddess of Liberty squarely in the face with a devotion to follow where she should lead.

As an immediate result the resolution of June 7 the resolution was laid over until the next day, when it was taken up for consideration, the fourth of July.

In order that the cause of liberty should not be retarded during this wait, congress at that time appointed a committee of five to prepare a declaration of independence of the same purport as Lee's resolution. In the hope that the new doctrine would be unanimously accepted when the matter should be again taken up in July.

Adams demanded that a southerner should be chosen to write the declaration in order to increase the probability of its unanimous adoption. Logically, Jefferson was the man to carry this work through, for the masterly style of his pen was well known. With such coworkers, though, it cannot be supposed that he alone was the author of the resolution, for the responsibility had been assigned to all five jointly, and the counsel and advice of all were necessary.

However, the credit of the phraseology is given to Jefferson, while John Adams is said to have been the strong arm of the committee, and the amending of the resolution. The entire committee labored together the documents by making it the subject of critical analysis. In allowing the declaration of independence to be ready before its assembly on June 28 congress proceeded in schedule.

Satisfied that all were acquainted with its contents, the legislature then laid the bill on the table until a special committee could be appointed by congress sitting as a committee of the whole.

By trial vote July 1 only nine colonies voted as favorable to the resolution.

Final legislative action was therefore deferred until the next day. That, July 2, was probably the most memorable of all dates of our national history. During the stormy debate at that time the declaration was both attacked and commended.

Only by a vote of the day was taken it was found that the declaration had been unanimously indorsed by all of the thirteen colonies.

The vote in favor of the declaration was not sufficient to make the adoption of the new resolution complete, for the next day congress sat as a committee of the whole to consider the bill. At that time slight alterations were made, certain clauses concerning England were omitted and others regarding slave trade were left out, while other amendments were added.

On July 4 congress assembled again and definitely received itself into a committee for the consideration of the Declaration of Independence. At that time the adoption of the document was made with the consent of the thirteen colonies.

Mary Katharine Goddard, a woman who carried on the printing business on Broadside, Baltimore, probably never heard of woman's rights, yet it so happened that it became her lot to print these copies of the American bill of rights.

From these copies the signatures were made, until before long every home boasted at least one copy of the original document which gave life to our republic.

THE SANDMAN IN STORY

By Mrs. F. A. WALKER

THE LITTLE BROWN MEN

Did you ever hear of the little Brown Men who live in the rocks and stones in the woods and come out when the moon is shining?

They have pointed brown beards and bright shiny eyes and wear little brown caps, short brown jackets and trousers and high brown boots.

They are very small and can easily hide under the leaves on the ground.

One day Pritz and Hans were going through the woods kicking the leaves as they walked, when all at once a voice said: "Take care, you almost kicked my nose!" Both boys jumped, and right in front of them was a little Brown Man, holding his hand over his nose.

"You should be more careful," he said. "You might hurt someone kicking along in that way."

"We beg your pardon, I am sure," said Hans, "but we did not know you were there. I should think you would be afraid someone would step on you if you are so near the color of the leaves."

"If you keep in the path you will not step on us," said the little man.

"Are there more like you?" asked the boy.

"Oh, yes, indeed," he answered. "We live inside the rocks, but sometimes we sleep outside. This is the time we were and a night when the moon is shining, we come out."

"I should think you would be afraid of the wild animals," said Fritz.

"They would not bother us," replied the little man. "Don't you know I have seven a good bite for them?"

"I wonder what they eat?" asked Hans.

"Yes; we see lions and bears and there."

"Wish we could see some," said Hans. "I should like to shoot a bear and have his skin to put in front of the fire this winter, then we could lie on it and roll by the fire-light."

"Why don't you shoot one?" asked the little man.

"We have never seen one," replied the boys.

"Well, come in here some night and I will show you some. Have you a gun?"

"We could take father's; he has two. Where can we come?" they asked, eagerly.

"Tomorrow night," said the little man. "I'll meet you here."

"If you could have a tiger, too," said Fritz, "I would be very much obliged. I should like to have a tiger's hide."

"I will do my best," said the little man.

The next night the boys were there with their guns and the little man held their bags and they went out. It was time for the little Brown Men to come out when then the rock on the side of the hill opened and they came out, fighting up the weeds like a little brown Man running toward home, and he jumped up. The rock opened and out hopped a dozen or more little Brown Men. Then all the little men gathered some more and the canes from all sorts of places, under the leaves, out of the trees, and the woods seemed filled with them. They all gathered around the boys, some of the men climbed over them, and some went into their pockets, and the boys felt very uncomfortable, but their little friend said the little men were just curious, and not to mind, they soon make happy when out of many holes came out, lighting up the words like fire, and the boys could see the little Brown Men running over rocks in all directions, but their friend stayed by them.

"When shall we see the animals?" asked Fritz.

"The others have gone to find them," replied the little man.

The boys could feel their hearts beating, for now they were really to see the animals. Not a word was said while the man was in the woods with the canes of the

"Why, Hans, 'tis a seasingly trifle! Indeed the debates of that day might probably have lasted over until the next, and so July 5 would have become the birthday instead of July 4.

Toward evening the discomfort of the assembly was increased on account of the swarms of flies which came from a nearby livery stable into the hall of legislature. These pests were so audacious in assaults upon the statesmen that Jefferson said their importunate buzzing brings the matter to a conclusion, and Harrison reported the declaration to congress as accepted, though in the minutes of that day the declaration was at first left out on account of the "numerous alterations."

Today Independence hall in the old state house in Philadelphia, remains about as it was on that July 4, and so as far as the setting of the drama is complete, but the drama itself is left for us to supply.

All that we have left of the record of that memorable day is the text of the Declaration of Independence, and as that represents what all three American colonists were ready to lay down their lives for and what should be handed down to us and guarded as contemporary as it had been won, the Fourth of July has amply served its purpose and deserved its one enrollment: "The Spirit of Liberty for All."

Whether or not the Declaration of Independence was signed on July 4, 1776, by any but Hancock as president of the Continental congress and Thomson, as secretary, is a matter of doubt, for the journal entry records "signed by order of and in behalf of the delegates." Jefferson himself made conflicting statements regarding this question.

Some contend that the delegates met informal by on the morning of July 5 and signed the document. Whether or not the signatures were affixed on July 4, congress' act was official on that day that Jefferson's Declaration of Independence was declared acceptable to every colony. And so it received that copies should be sent throughout the new-born nation.

The general assemblies, conventions, councils, committees of safety and committees of inspection of the Continental army had to be informed of the independence of the United States. Copies were signed by Hancock and Thompson. The Congressional Record of July 19 shows that a resolution was introduced in the general assembly to the effect that the declaration should be engrossed in parchment and proceeded for the signature of every member on August 2.

This fact, therefore, serves as authority that the sheepskin copy signed on that day in August, after it had been compared with the fair copy and the latter destroyed, is the copy of the Declaration of Independence which was considered for so many years the original and which is the bill of rights of the American people. It is said that even this signing was entered into with "fear and trembling."

Satisfied that the signed parchment was a lasting evidence of the birth of the new nation congress took no further official action regarding the instrument itself until January, 1777.

By that time the new republic began to feel its strength, and congress decided to have copies of the document sent to the Declaration of Independence by ordering that printed copies of the document should be made with the names of the signers added.

Mary Katharine Goddard, a woman who carried on the printing business on Broadside, Baltimore, probably never heard of woman's rights, yet it so happened that it became her lot to print these copies of the American bill of rights.

From these copies the signatures were made, until before long every home boasted at least one copy of the original document which gave life to our republic.

QUITE USEFUL FOR CAMPERS

Clothing or Regimentals Can Be Hung on Hooks by Use of Handy Hanger Shown Herewith.

A handy little article for campers or for members of National Guard organizations is the clothes hanger shown in the illustration. Anyone who has camped out knows how scarce room is inside of a tent and how limited are the places upon which garments or strong leather strap into which three wooden hooks are fastened. The strap is designed to be fastened around the tent pole or a small tree in the vicinity by means of the buckle. Clothing or regimentals can then be hung on the hooks. Another advantage in hanging clothing up instead of letting it lie around on the floor or ground, is the comparative safety accorded from insects that so often crawl into garments occasionally leaser aside. Used by soldiers, it keeps their clothing in good shape for inspection.

Learn to Let Go.

By holding on too long to things we should drop we are in danger of missing the better things coming to take their place. Playing dolls is delightful fun for girls of a certain age, but the girl who clings to her dolls too long will miss other better pleasures. Learn to let go when the time comes. The mastery of that lesson would make happy women out of many who now are discontented.—Ella's Companion.

The Efficacy of Prayer.

Bobby had been taught to remember all his relatives when he said his prayers. One night, as he knelt at his mother's knee, he did not mention the name of a favorite aunt.

"Why, Bobby," said the mother, "you didn't say 'God bless Aunt Bessie' and she had been so good to you."

"Well, mother," replied the little boy, "I don't have to say that and more. Aunt Beatrice's engaged."—Ladies Home Journal.

His Chosen Profession.

"And what do you expect to be when you grow up, Bobby?" asked a minister; "a lawyer like your father?"

"No, thank you," replied the boy. "I'm too much like papa to make a success of anything."

"Then what do you think of being a doctor, maybe, but I guess I'll be a blind tamer."

Where the Injunction Failed.

"Why, Willie," said the teacher, "have you been fighting again? Didn't you learn that when you are struck on one cheek you ought to turn the other one to the striker?"

"Yes, ma'am," said Willie, "but he hit me on the nose, and I've only got one."

VALUE OF THE "SCRAP HEAP"

"Secondary Metals" Have Added Much to the Wealth of the United States.

In 1914 the value of the "secondary metals," exclusive of gold, silver, platinum, iron and steel, recovered in the United States was $57,008,796, according to J. P. Dunlop of the United State geological survey. This is a decrease from 1913 of $15,746,231, the secondary metals recovered in that year being valued at $72,755,027.

The term "secondary" does not imply that these metals, which are recovered from metal metal, sweepings, skimming drosses, etc. are of inferior quality, but it is used to distinguish them from "primary metals," which are derived from ore. While the survey marine relates to lead, tine, copper, aluminum, tin and antimony given in this statement cover a large field and form an essential addition to the supply of primary metals, the source of the inquiry probably reveals less than one-half the extent of the waste metal trade. The value of the old iron and steel reused amounts to millions of dollars.

The Proudest Moment.

"Oh, yes," said a fellow's proudest moment was not the time he came out on top in his first scrap with the kid who had looked from the time he first saw "Mary Jane home from the party. No, sir, Sam, was it when she named the day."

"I wasn't when he made his biggest business deal; got his largest raise; became a partner in the concern and married the girl he loved."

And while this, too, was a proud moment, the proudest of all was not when the fist-born came, nor was it when the youngster first lisped "dada."

All those were big moments, moments most every fellow remembers long and happily, but the real proud est moment was the first time when He wore his first pair of long pants!

Bought Information.

During an interrogation of a Josef Hofmann recital in a New Jersey town, a woman standing through the program observed the following advance notice: "Thursday Eve., March 25th, at Carnegie hall. Philharmonic Society of New York. Soloist—Zimbalist." Turning to her companion, she asked: "Tell me, I'm not very familiar with musical instruments, but what's a Zimbalist?"

Hopeless.

"Oh, dear," said Mrs. Bleecher, "I wish the house-boat would win a game or two. They've been losing steadily for two weeks."

"I didn't know you took any interest in baseball," said her friend.

"Oh, don't, but I want a new gown, and there's no use asking John for it until he's in the money."

SHE GUIT
But It Was Hard Pull.

It is hard to believe that coffee will hit a person in such a condition as it did an Ohio woman. She tells her own story:

"I did not believe coffee caused my stomach trouble and nervousness, so I kept it so well I would not, and could not, quit drinking it, and I was a miserable sufferer from heart trouble and nervous prostration for four years.

"I was scarcely able to be around, had no energy, and did not care for anything. Was emaciated and had a constant pain around my heart until I thought I could not endure it.

"Frequently I had nervous chills and the least excitement would drive sleep away, and my little sons would upset me terribly. I was gradually getting worse until finally I asked myself what's the use of being sick all the time and buying medicine so that I could indulge myself in coffee?

"So I got some Postum to help me quit. It was hard to stick strictly to directions and I want to tell you that genius will be the greatest gift in my life. It was easy to quit coffee because I now like Postum better than the coffee.

"One by one the old troubles left me. I'm not the invalid like sixteen stones it seems into people's systems disgusted as an ordinary cold. Isn't on the hard, little sequestered or inflammatory rheumatism, both of which are brave and fearless and will walk right up to you and kick you on the shins, big as you are.

two hours later they had about 233 children crowding the public school of my medulla oblongata, and every time anybody wanted to get a message through the spinal cord they had to stand aside and let the message pass.

Before daylight came all these grip children had graduated from school and were fighting, quarreling, and making noise in the public school house the whole bunch had married and had large families of their own, and all hands were out paddling their canoes on my alimentary canal.

By nine o'clock that morning there must have been eighty-five million grip germs engaged in a riot, all trying to shoot their bullets over the top of my interior desert, mount.

It was fierce!

When Doctor Lister arrived on the scene I was carrying enough concealed weapons to make a gunsmith pale. Doctor Lister said: "Take a dose of Postum and you will be well."

The good old pill pusher threw his saws behind the sofa, put his dog not on the mantlepiece, and took a fall out of my pulse.

"Ah!" he said, after he had noted the symptoms, "you have got a carry-comb."

"The same to you, Doc," I said.

"Ah!" he said, looking hard at the wall.

"Say, Doc!" I whispered; "there's no use to cut off my leg, because the germs will be greatly in my life. It was easy to quit coffee because I now like Postum better than the coffee.

"Ken?"

"Does your nerve center tinkle like the a breakfast bell in a kitchenless boarding house?"

"Right again!"

"Have you a feeling that the germs have attacked your Adam's apple and that there won't be any cure?"

"Yes!"

"When you look at the wall paper does your brain do a sort of loop-the-loop and cause you to mail 100 sore or double pinochle?"

"Yes, and 50 kings, too!"

"Do you feel a slight palpitation of the membrane of the colorado maduro and is there a continued murmur in your brain like the sound of a hard-working gas meter?"

"You've got me sized good and pretty, Doc!"

"Do you have insomnia, nightmare, loss of appetite, chills and fever and feeling in general that is the carolina perfecto?"

"What's the idea, Doc?"

"When you lie on your right side do you have an impulse to turn over on your left side, and when you turn over on your left side do you feel an impulse to pass out of bed and throw yourself out of a transom?"

"There isn't anything you can mention, Doc, that I haven't got."

"Ah!" said the doctor, then that settles it."

"Tell me the truth," I groaned. "What is the matter with me?"

"You have something worse—you have the grip," Doctor Lister whispered gently. "You see I tried hard to mention some symptom which you didn't have, but you had them and the grip is the only disease in the world which makes a specialty of having every symptom known to medical jurisprudence.

ITALY ACCS TO TURKE TROUBLES

Complications In Mediterranean Confidently Expected.

DIPLOMACY'S EFFORTS VAIN

Briton and German Red Tape Effective by Closes Practically All Commercial Channels—Americans Who Seek Imports Are Forced to Wait Until Termination of the War.

New York.—The outcome of Italy into the European war has added anot h to the embarrassments attending American commercial relations with Europe.

There have been growing more serious in the last three months. The dispositions of both Great Britain and Germany have been persistently adv and less considerate of the interests of neutrals, and inspi a feeling of disgust with all effort to carry on certain lines of foreign trade with the conti nent has taken possession of some of the business elements in this country, much to the regret of the commercial interests of the country.

Only a few days since a Chicago business man told a story of his own experience that illustrated the attitude.

"I have an order of $50,000 worth of drugs, chemicals, medicines and the like," he said, "bought and paid for in Germany. If I could get the goods into this country I could easily make 100 per cent profit on them. But between the German embargoes about exporting things that they fear may help enemy countries and the allies' restrictions against commerce getting out of and into Germany I have found it useless to push the matter."

The difficulties that can be thrown in the way of simple commercial transactions when both Germany and England show a disposition to oppose them are illustrated by the case of a consignment of potash which was destined to an American fertilizer manufacturer. This concern, having been for years the principal business of buying potash from Germany, had a large credit with the syndicate which controls the potash production and in which the German government holds a control. There was no question about the payment for the potash, because the money was already in the syndicate's hands.

The British authorities objected to the potash going out on the ground that they are trying to prevent commerce in enemy with Germany. But the particular case was so innocent that after a good deal of discussion the British authorities agreed to let the shipment come out.

Up to the time the Germans seemed anxious that the deal should be made. But just as soon as they learned that Britain had given way Berlin began to find objections. There must be absolute assurance that the potash would be used only for fertilizer making. This assurance was given, together with the promise that the American government committee would be responsible for the execution of the pledge. But at this point further conditions were imposed. The German wanted inspectors, representing the American government, to follow the potash to the factories, watch all the processes and then certify that it had been used all of it, for fertilizer.

This point was at tough a nut to crack. Then it occurred to the Germans that they would like to have an inspector of their own to inspect the American government inspector, see that he did his inspecting correctly—and half his expenses to be paid on this side.

That proved the last straw. The negotiation was dropped, and there is no present chance that potash getting to this side till after the war.

Large movements of oils, dyes, chemicals, drugs, medicines, potash and various other German specialties are held up by reason of the attitudes of both Germany and Britain. There has seemed to be little choice between the two countries as far as concern their insistence on unreasonable conditions for commerce.

The British attitude toward shipments of cotton has been especially discouraging to that trade. Commercial authorities of this geographical reality that Great Britain is determined to prevent hard to keep cotton out of Germany. In the effort to do this the whole movement of cotton to the continent has become involved. About twenty-five cargoes of cotton are now held up, according to the authorities here, and there is no knowing when they will be released. The termination of the whole problem. The British willingness to take over and pay for cargoes that are seized does not give satisfaction from any point of view, while the delays in getting the business settled are constantly more and more annoying.

With the war area being extended by the appearance of Italy among the belligerents new complications and difficulties in the Mediterranean are certain. Down to the present the allies have been very considerate of Italian sensibilities for obvious political reasons, and Mediterranean traffic has been mainly exempted from the onerous conditions imposed elsewhere. But Italy is now with the allies, and her forces will be united with theirs in extending the restrictions to Mediterranean traffic suspected of possibly being destined to any of the enemies of Italy and her allies.

AN INCIDENT OF WAR.

General Hugo and His Meeting With a Wounded Scout.

General Hugo, father of that literary genius, Victor Hugo, was a daring soldier and officer. He served nobly in both Italy and Spain and especially distinguished himself in putting down bandits and guerrillas. That he was a man as magnanimous as he was brave is attested by a little incident of his career that his son narrated. General Hugo, accompanied by a single trusted hussar orderly, had occasion, at the close of a day of fighting, to ride across a portion of the battlefield as dusk was beclouding to fall.

"He heard a feeble sound in the shadows," wrote Victor Hugo. "It was a soldier of the Spanish army, who dragged himself along the roadway, pale, bleeding, gasping and who cried, 'A drink, a drink, in the name of pity?'

"My father, touched, handed his canteen to his faithful hussar, and said, 'Here, give a drink to that poor, wounded fellow.' Suddenly, as the hussar, stooping, leaned over him, the man, a Moor of some sort, snatched the pistol he carried and fired it at his father's head, crying, 'Carambe!' The ball grazed so close that the hat fell, and the charger reared wildly backward.

"'Give him the drink all the same, said my father.'"—Youth's Companion.

Punch and Judy.

Turkey is far from being the only oriental land in which a performance very like the English Punch and Judy can be found. Travelers have described entertainments of the kind in Persia, Japan, Kamchatka, India, Egypt, Syria, Nubia, Siam, Pegu, Ava, Cochin China, China and Tartary. Mr. Villiers Stuart describes the Egyptian Punch dancing the manteur (chief magistrate) and his entrance quite in the style of the British Punch's conduct toward beadles and policemen, though in the Egyptian version the play ended morally, with the hanging of Punch. The hero belongs to all ages as well as to most lands. Some have traced him to the Atellan farces of early Italy, and he has even been recognized in ancient Egyptian hieroglyphics.—London Standard.

Chanak-Kalesi.

Chanak-Kalesi, the straggling town near the "narrows" of the Dardanelles, means "earthenware castle" in Turkish and is so called from a centuries-old pottery on the Asiatic side of the strait. An agent from this pottery used to be always on the lookout for a wandering European and hooked on to every passing ship. His boatload of gaudy crockery was generally more remarkable for gilding and tawdry color than for taste. But the forms of the vessels were often graceful, even classical, and specimens of the tall water jugs he sells, or once sold, can be seen throughout the Levant, though seldom in London.—London Chronicle.

SUBMERGED SUBMARINES.

Signs by Which They May Be Located From an Aeroplane.

In answer to a correspondent who asks to what extent a man in an aeroplane can watch the movements of a submerged submarine boat the S Sentinel's American replies:

"We have consulted a naval aeronautic expert on the visibility of submarines from an aeroplane. He states that if the surface of the water is smooth and the water is fairly clear a submarine can ordinarily be observed visually from an aeroplane at any depth the submarine is likely to travel, which is usually not over 100 feet. Experiments have been made off Guantanamo, Cuba, and Annapolis, Md., and in the latter case the submarines were able to avoid observation at first by sailing to a muddy bottom. But the aviators soon learned to pick them out by some sign, such, for example, as escape of air bubbles."

In another article on the subject the Scientific American says that when the sea is rough it is much more difficult to discern a submarine. The captains of a warship can watch the course of a submarine by the bubbles it sends to the surface when the sea is smooth, but these bubbles are scarcely discernible when the sea is choppy. The disturbed surface inevitably makes it more difficult for an observer in an aeroplane to see what is going on below.

A Swiss Philanthropy.

The custom still obtains in Switzerland, though not so generally as formerly, of newly married couples making a small gift to orphans immediately after the wedding ceremony to the school funds as a sort of thanksgiving for their education. These funds are used to provide shoes and clothing for poor pupils who would otherwise be unable to attend school.

Garden of the Near East.

Brusa, situated at the foot of Mount Olympus, in Asiatic Turkey, is the garden city of the near east. Its mosque and public building and almost every house stands in its own garden, under the shadow of some cypress or fig trees. The fame of the surrounding district is so rich and varied that it has been the happy hunting ground of botanists for centuries, and some authorities regard it as the cradle land of many of our greatest spring flowers—the hyacinth, the tulip, the snowdrop and the jonquil.—London Spectator.

The Feminine Financier.

"So she has broken the engagement? Did she give you back the diamond ring?"

"No. We are deadlocked. She says she will give me back the price I paid for it, but diamonds have doubled in value and that she is entitled to the profit."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Made Her a Fright.

"Mrs. Jones has a new hat."

"Yes, you look saucily pleased about it."

"You just ought to see how it looks on her."—Houston Post.

In Distress.

"Why are you going over dog up side down, Suburbs?"

"To let the neighbors know that the cook's gone and all invitations are off."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Its Accompaniment.

"I have an eye for the stage."

"Then look out you don't get the hook too."—Baltimore American.

Sunset on Mount Cook.

Sunset on Mount Cook is a thing of little junction of fact which are curious to the climber. In fact, in fine weather, the sublimate end of sunset may be readily explained. The fast particles fall to the ground of their own weight when they get beyond the floating power of the chimney and out of the current of the heated air formed in the chimney flue.

There is a lot of carbonic acid gas in smoke which mixes with the air and sensibly increases food for plants, more rather amass which are not further convinced when they come from the chimney are forced in the air still more until they, too, become carbonic acid gas.—Boston Herald.

Land of the Date Palm.

Beyond the land of the Berbers, in the far south of Morocco, lies the great oasis of Tafilet, famous for its vast groves of date palms. Here for hundreds of miles the land is covered with a thick growth of the tall, straight stems of the palm, and the product of these close growing trees is enormous in quantity. They produce the finest dates in the world.

No Wonder.

"Hogan says he can't swim up to his work." "Certainly not. He makes artificial ice."—Buffalo Express.

CHAPTER XVI—Continued.

He eved indecisively the stairs and then glanced toward the brilliant night outside. It would not be possible to sleep in that room again. He he tiptoed out to the cafe veranda and dropped into a comfortable chair. He would hunt them up some time during the day. He knew Mr. Sadler for fifty pounds, and he sincerely hoped that Mallow would refuse him. For he was grimly resolved that Mallow should pay for those half-truths, more damning than bald lies. It was due to Mallow that he was never more to see or speak to Elsa. He emptied the sack from his cutty which he stowed away.

The great heartache and the great disillusion would not have fallen to his lot had Elsa been frank to Hannigan, had she but told him that she was to sail on the same steamer. He would have put off the sailing. He would have gone his way, still believing himself to be a Bayard, a Galahad or any other of those simple dreamers who put honor and chivalry above and before all other things.

Elsa! He covered his face with his hands and remained in that position for a long while, so long indeed that the coolies, whose business it was to strew the tilings every morning at four, went at it their work quietly for fear of disturbing him.

Elsa had retired almost immediately after dinner. She endeavored to form some initial work on one of her broideries, but the needle insisted upon pierced and sailing stitch after stitch. She went to bed and strove to sleep, but that event healer came not to her wooing. Nothing she did could overcome the realization of the shock she had received. It had left her dull and bewildered.

The room echoed and re-echoed through her mind: Paul Ellison. It should have been an illumination; instead, she had been shown not the utter darkness. Neither Arthur nor his mother had ever spoken of a brother, and she had known them for nearly ten years. Two sons, she might be in brothers, with the same name; it was conceivable. What could it mean? The beautiful white-haired mother, the handsome charming son, who idolized each other, and this adventurer, this outcast, this cattiest, brave and kindly spirit, with his funny parrakeet, what was he to them and they to him? It was to be, it must be, that they were brothers. Nature, full of amazing freaks as she was, had not perpetrated this one without calling upon a single strain of blood.

But if they among her pillows, her eyes leveled at the few stars beyond her door, opened to admit any cooling breeze. Her head ached. It was like the computations of astronomers to a certain extent the human mind could grasp the distances but could not comprehend them. It was more than chance. Chance alone had not brought him to the crumbling lodge. There was a strain of fatalism in Elsa. She was positive that all these things had been written long before and that she was to be used as the key.

Paul Ellison.

She drew from the past those salient recollections of Arthur and his mother. First, the day the two had called regarding the purchase of a house that her father had just put on the market—a rambling old colonial affair, her own mother's birthplace (strange, she had not quite been that, just free from her school days in Italy. With the grand air of youth she had betrayed the fact almost instantly, while waiting for her father to come into the living room.

"Italy!" said Arthur's mother, whom Elsa mentally adopted at once. The woman's voice spoke a simple reverie, which Elsa answered in excellent if formal Italian. This led from one question to another. Mrs. Ellison turned out to be a schoolmate of her mother's, after she, Elsa, had listened their very room. What more was needed?

The Ellisons bought the house and lived quietly within it. Society, and there was a good deal of it in that small Kentucky city, society wanted for them to approach and apply their aristocracy, but waited in vain. Mrs. Ellison never went anywhere. Her son Arthur was a student and preferred his books. He was simply seeking bitterness

GALICIA SCENE OF TITANIC STRUGGLE

It Is Poorest of All the Provinces of Austria.

MANY FAMOUS SALT MINES.

If Continental United States, Exclusive of Alaska, Were as Densely Populated as Galicia, We Would Boast of a Population Four Times as Great as That of Russia.

For months war dispatches from Galicia—when vast armies have swayed back and forth, locked in one of the quintessing titanic struggles of history to decide the fate of empires and of two mighty races—have gripped the popular attention more than the news from any other battle theater. On Galicia's fields during the past few months have been done such feats of arms as the modern world could not have dreamed of, the stench of dead and wounded swept over this Austrian crown land, driving its powerful armies out of the plain in the north, over the central hills, up the southern slopes of the ragged Carpathians, to their lofty, icy crests, beyond these crests and hovered over the fertile prairie land of Hungary.

Here the wave spent its irresistible force, and upon the dreary mountain rocks, above the clouds, amid the ice and snow and chill cold of early spring, the flower of Russian and Austro-German strength began rolling backward, toward the north, still locked in continuous, grinding battle, until the foothills were left behind and the Teutonic forces recaptured Lemberg. The story of this war theater that has all but held some of earth's sternest, most bitter scenes is intimately described by William Joseph Showalter in a statement prepared for the National Geographic society. This writer says:

"Austria-Poland, a practically unknown by the crown land of Galicia. The crown land is almost exactly the size of the state of South Carolina, but it has a population six times as great. It continental United States, exclusive of Alaska, were as densely populated as Galicia we would boast of a population four times as great as that of Russia. And yet Galicia is the poorest of all the provinces of Austria. It lies outside the ramparts of the Carpathians, which rob 7 of the warm winds that otherwise would come to it from the south and also turn back upon it the cold winds of the north.

Royal Palace in Cracow.

"The glory of Poland's past and the hope of her future are Cracow and Lemberg, for it was the former that was her capital in the splendor of history and the latter that is her capital today and which would be her capital tomorrow were Polish dreams to come true. In Cracow, the great city of Poland's past, the royal palace still stands, but it is used as a barracks and not as the home of a king. The cathedral is now the Valhalla of its departed greatness. For there are buried all the heroes from the Jagellons to Kosciusko. Not far away is the Kosciusko hill, one of the most remarkable memorials ever reared by the hand of man, a huge mound of earth brought by loyal Poles from every battlefield in the world connected with Polish history.

"The country around Cracow is flat and is devoted almost wholly to small farming and trucking. The peasants dress in white jackets and blue breeches and wear jackboots. Their women talk with large bright shawls and picturesque headdresses, brighten and give spirit to the landscape.

"Above Cracow to Lemberg the traveler encounters good land; it is fairly level and entirely lacking of those boundary stones marking petty lines and estates or hedges keeping live stock where it belongs. The same methods of agriculture that we used in the United States before the days of the self binder and the grain drill are still in force in that region.

"It is in Lemberg that the only Polish dominated legislative assembly in existence holds its sessions, for Lemberg is the capital of Galicia, and the Poles, both because of their political ability and their numerical weight, control the Galician legislature to the exclusion of their rivals, the Ruthenians of East Galicia. The city of Lemberg is largely modern, a compact unless surrounded by scattering suburbs.

World Famous Salt Mines.

"While Galicia is almost wholly an agricultural region and while a large percentage of that agriculture is carried on in the primitive way, there are some few manufacturing neighborhoods and industrial districts. Drohobycz occupies the center of a mine industrie, and there are many beet sugar and tobacco factories. Petroleum springs abound along the Carpathians, and some of the towns in this region grow from small villages to modern Beaumonts between New York and Christiania.

"Galicia has many of the world's most famous salt mines. Those at Wieliczka have been worked for nearly seven centuries, at one time being a principal source of revenue for the Polish kings. Railroads are not permitted to run into them but their vibrations reach to caverns. Within these hollows is laworkin of salt been streets and alleys, lined with pillars of charcoal, stalactites, curious caves, shrines and monuments."

TWO GREAT INVENTORS

Their Foresight Did Not Equal Their Ingenious Ability.

Not infrequently great inventors do not comprehend the significance of the thing they have produced. An inventor outlines a course of thought in a science whose foresight did not equal their inventive ability appears in Les Inventions illustrees.

When Herz first began to obtain satisfactory results from his now famous researches into the possibility of transmitting electric waves certain men of science suggested that some day similar wireless waves might be transmitted messages through space. Herz laughed at the hypothesis and assured all comers that his experiments were for laboratory only. Now, after a few short years, it is hard to find a single issue of a daily paper that does not record some noteworthy example of the use of wireless telegraphy.

Lenoir was the great engineer who sketched the automobile with such skill that his design has not been material ly changed to this day. After Lenoir had accomplished his historic trip from Paris to Bordeaux and return at the dizzy speed of almost fifteen miles an hour his admirers gave him a banquet, during the toasts one of them stirred by the spirit of the occasion, rose and enthusiastically called on his assembly to drink to the approaching day when carriages should travel at the speed of sixty miles an hour. Lenoir turned to his nearest neighbor and asked in a quick undertone, "Why is it that after every banquet some people feel called on to make fools of themselves?"

IRON IN WATER.

It Takes Only the Least Little Bit to Make Trouble.

Half a part per million of iron in water is objectable by taste, and more than four or five parts makes water unpalatable. In some mineral springs there is a constituent which imparts a medicinal value to the water, but of quantity it is undesirable. More than 2.5 parts per million in water used for laundering causes a stain on the clothes. Iron must be removed from water from which ice is made or of death discolored product will result. An iron content of over two or three parts per million in water used for the manufacture of paper will stain the paper.

Iron is harmful in water used for steaming, for it is in equilibrium with acids which attack the boiler become dissolved, with the result that the iron oxide corrodes the boiler plates, but the amount of iron carried in solution by some waters is so small that the damage it does to steam boilers generally escapes notice.

Waters having a high iron content have in some places, where they have been used as city supplies, caused an immense amount of trouble and expense, for they frequently have caused irremediable to such a degree that the iron deposits have accumulated with the iron sludge of that organism. The removal of iron from water is a matter of easy and economical difficulty.—United States Geological Survey.

Quite.

Little Mandie could not tell whoppers. One day her aunt thought she ought to be cured of this habit, so she spoke seriously to the little maid, who promised to mend her ways.

To prove the point it was told the tale of the shepherd boy who was always calling "Wolf, wolf!" and nobody believed him. Then one day the wolf really came and ate up all the sheep.

"All the sheep?" interrupted Mandie. "Yes, every one of them," replied aunt in desolation.

"Every single one?"

Aunt nodded.

"Well," said Mandie slowly, "I don't believe you, aunt, for I don't believe the So there!—London Answers.

STANDARD SCHOOL AT ADVANCE, EVELINE TOWNSHIP

The honor of being the first Standard School in Charlevoix county goes to the Advance school in Eveline township.

The people of this district have awakened to the fact that pleasant surroundings are as necessary for the proper development of growing boys and girls as for the production of milk in the dairy herd.

The teacher, Mr. Ernest Peasley, started the movement and was ably seconded by the Ladies' Improvement Society and during the year they raised and expended over 70 dollars aside from what the board expended. They have a new organ, a drinking fountain, a ventilating system, a splendid library, a new adjustable seats, plenty of good state blackboards, five extra windows with speedil blinds for controlling the light and other necessary equipment.

The grounds have been plowed and will be cultivated and seeded this summer. They were ready for inspection in April but Mr. Orsell of the State Department was unable to get here sooner on account of the size of the territory he has to cover.

On Tuesday, June 22, the people of the neighborhood to the number of about 75 met at the school house and the teacher took charge of the meeting after one of the prettiest picnic dinners that the writer has been privileged to partake of. A literary program was given by the pupils of the school and was appreciated by all present.

It was the writer's pleasure to present, in behalf of the Department of Public Instruction, a beautiful Standard Plate which was then placed in its proper place on the building.

Two other schools in the county have been passed as standard and plates will be presented this week. They are number 1 and 7 frl, Chandler township.

Number 1, Bay; number 4, Hayes; number 5 and 4, Hunson; number 5, Melrose have also been mentioned by the Department as being within easy reach of the standard list and it only remains for some of the patrons of these districts to get busy and express a willingness to expend a very little money in repairs and equipment to put them on the list.

The Advance school required a lot of improvements and the expenditure of quite a sum of money but it has been a long time since I have seen a prouder bunch of people than those assembled at the picnic on the 22nd.

To Mr. Peasley, more than to any other particular individual, belongs the credit. He directed all of the work and did a goodly portion of it himself, for he is a workman as well as a leader.

The Three Bells school has secured the services of Mr. Peasley for next year and they are now planning to make that school standard.

Let the good work go on.

Respectfully submitted,
J. H. MILFORD.

Everything Double Except the Price

This sounds reasonable.
But it is more than that —it is extraordinary.

There is absolutely no necessity for the woman of large figure paying extra prices for her corsets, or wearing corsets that are ponderous and much burdened with extra straps and belts.

We have an extraordinary Warner's Rust-Proof model with the patented double skirt—Style 623. This double skirt, extending from the waist line down, gives the strongest kind of support and will not rip or tear. Of course the boning, steels, interlinings, etc., are double. All Warner Corsets have these features.

Style 623 is for medium figures with medium bust and medium skirt. It is one of the best all around corsets we have ever had the pleasure of selling. If you are looking for bargains, this is a real one.

Price - $1.00

Gerrett V. Nash, one of the pioneers of this county, formerly engaged in the lumber and mercantile business at Norwood, but for several years engaged in the same business in Arkansas, is the guest of his brother-in-law, F. J. Moech, for a week.

John Bragenzer, salesman on Commissioner Hammond's Boyne City road work, had a hand so badly crushed Wednesday that he was brought to Dr. Armstrong's office and Capt. Nash notified. The accident happened while connecting the traction engine to the road wagon.

"There's a boy up at Mason Rose's house; it happened Saturday. Monday he received a postal card from a friend which read as follows: "I understand you now why you boughtt a Ford; 'cause its a family car. There's a muffler for father, a hood for mother and a rattler for baby."

The howl of the automobiles is a study in harmony, dynamics and counterpoint. We get the crescendo, diminuendo, staccato, fortissimo and pianissimo. There is the roar, the screech and howl. We get about one minute of it. If all these sounds could be massed into one grand outburst the dead would climb out of Brookside.

Don't forget that the great event of the season will be the Masonic Fair to be held in the Masonic Temple the second week in August. A great deal of work is being done in preparing for the fair, and it promises to be a very attractive affair. Keep the date in mind.

Strawberries constitute the shortest lived but the most profitable crop of any cultivated in this neck-of-the-woods, and the quality is supreme over the fruit of any other clime. But the local supply is not equal to the demand. The fruit of double the present acreage can be sold. Put out more strawberry plants.

Robert A. Miller died at the home of his daughter, near Boyne, at noon Friday. Mr. Miller was one of the early pioneers of this section, having located on the farm in Norwood township now known as the L. D. Porter farm. For a number of years he was a member of the board of poor commissioners.

The weather made the Fourth somewhat of a dullsome affair. The day was ushered in with a cold rain which continued until well along in the afternoon, making participation in the festivities very uncomfortable. A clear sunset and a pleasant evening followed, making the remainder happy. The display of fireworks in Charlevoix was particularly brilliant—resort people spending generously in the display.

Dr. A. E. Stripp and wife, of Laurel, Montana, are at the Hotel Michigan for the summer. Dr. Stripp is another Charlevoix boy who has not only made good but who has attained distinction in his profession. After graduating from the University of Michigan, Dr. Stripp began practice about ten years ago in Dr. Armstrong's office. After a year's practice he went to Montana. Now he is a railroad surgeon and mayor of Laurel.

W. W. Campbell, father of Mrs. Frank McShane, of this city, died at his home in Fort Huron last Friday. A heart failure, aged 72 years. Deceased was a civil war veteran with a splendid record. The funeral occurred Sunday under the auspices of the G. A. R., and the esteem in which he was held was attested by the turning out of the National Guard company as an escort. He was well known in this city. Mrs. Sears returned from Fort Huron Tuesday.

The University of Michigan has approved and placed on its list of accredited schools nearly 300 Michigan secondary schools. The privilege of sending students to the University of Michigan on diplomas, is limited to these approved or accredited schools. The entire list is made up after the recently completed inspection by the university authorities. The inspection resulted in the removal of four schools which were numbered in the 1910-11 list of accredited schools, and of the addition of 21, which did not appear in last year's list. Charlevoix is included in the 21 lucky ones.

A terrific explosion was heard from over the alley back of the Ivy drug store Wednesday. It made so much noise that the crowd on Bridge street streamed down Van Felt Place, and then some more. It turned out that a crowd of boys had broken off their Fourth of July celebration. One of the boys ignited a fire cracker and inserted it through the bung-hole of an empty alcohol barrel in which gas had generated. It blew out the head and landed it nearly a block away. Three windows in the rear of Frank Wood's barber shop were broken by the force of the explosion.

Elk Rapids Progress: Henry and Thomas of Yale returned last week from California, where he spent the winter. He will spend the summer here, caring for his orchard and vineyard, and then return to the coast for the winter.

STEAMER MACKINAC CHARTERED

Fine Amodi Boat to Run on Bay, Making Two Trips Per Week to Charlevoix.

The Northern Michigan Transportation company has chartered the steamer Mackinac of the Amodi line and will shortly make definite announcement of schedules for regular, special and moonlight trips, says the Traverse City Record. The Mackinac is a steel ship, 180-foot keel, with beam and with large capacity for carrying passengers.

She is due to arrive here Friday evening and on Saturday, July 3, will run an excursion to the Independence Day celebration at Old Mission. On Sunday afternoon and evening, July 4, there will be trips on the bay. On Monday, the 5th, trips will be made in the morning, afternoon and evening to the celebration at Bowers Harbor.

The regular freight and passenger runs will probably begin on Thursday of next week. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday she will make the round trip to Charlevoix Harbor, Old Mission, Suttons Bay and Omena. On Sunday, Tuesday and Sunday evening boat rides on the bay will be given. She will leave at 7:00 o'clock and returning at 11:00. A dance floor will be provided and an orchestra will be carried on the pleasure trips. At the end of the trips the boat will take on freight for bay points, returning the following morning at about 4:00. On Saturday nights freight will be taken on and stops made at Bowers Harbor, Old Mission, Suttons Bay, Omena and Northport, the boat connecting with the Mission at Glen Haven for Chicago. This will bring Saturday's fruit shipments into Chicago Monday morning between 8 and 9 o'clock.

On Tuesdays and Thursdays she will run to Charlevoix, touching at Omena, Northport and Northport Point, connecting at Charlevoix with the Manitou south for Chicago and with the Missouri north for the Soo and intermediate points.

COMEDY SHOW AT CHARLEVOIX THEATRE.

"Lovers and Lunatics," the last musical comedy to be offered by the La-Salle Musical company of Chicago at the Majestic theatre, is said to be the best in its repertoire. It's a laugh-getter from start to finish, and should attract bigger audiences than any of its others.

The comedy revolves about two couples, mother and daughter, father and son. Mother and son elope, and so father and daughter, father and son. Mother and son elope, and so father and daughter, father and son. Complications and mistaken identities are the order of the day. The cast is said to be exceptionally strong, and the music is said to be of the kind that will please the most critical. The company will be here for three nights, beginning next Tuesday, July 13, and will give a matinee on the last day.

Petoskey News: Commodore A. L. Hamill, the man who "remade" the inland route and who managed it for more than twenty years, has returned to Petoskey for the summer season and Saturday morning made the announcement that he will manage the Charlevoix Dock line of boats on the Beautiful Inland Route this season.

Traverse City Record: Thought to have been despondent because of continued poor health, Frank E. Goodrich, one of Traverse City's successful men of enterprise, committed suicide this morning between 9:15 and 9:30 in the garage adjoining his home, 131 North Elmwood avenue. Using a 44-calibre revolver, he placed the barrel in his mouth and fired, the bullet passing through the roof of his mouth and emerging near the forehead, between his eyes. Death was instantaneous. Deceased was a son of the late Reuben Goodrich, who was one of the earliest pioneers of the Grand Traverse region.

East Jordan Herald: The State Military Board at their last meeting issued a general order for the mustering into the service of the Militia of East Jordan's Independent Military Company. This will take place in the armory of the company on the evening of Wednesday, July 14. General John P. Kirk, chief of staff, and Colonel Rogers, quarter master general, will be the state officers present. The officers and members of our military company are putting forth every effort to have everything in readiness for this occasion, and there will be few companies in the state that will have the record of ability and experience at the time of their entry into state service that East Jordan's company will have.

Petoskey News: The Corswell Beef company, which has maintained cold storage plants and office and headquarters in Petoskey years, is moving its headquarters for this part of the state and its cold storage plant to Traverse City. Herbert Agnes, the Petoskey manager, and Roy D. Bradshaw, assistant manager, will go to Traverse City Tuesday and the books of the company will also be moved there Tuesday morning. It would take quite a story to give all of the details of this move. For some time there has been in Michigan a company known as the Saginaw Beef company and the Corswell Beef company and the Corswell Beef company. A few weeks ago these companies were consolidated and July 1 will open business under the firm name of the Corswell company, with headquarters in Saginaw.

East Jordan Enterprise: Wm. Bartley, a farmer living northeast of this city, committed suicide this morning by hanging himself to a tree about thirty rods from his residence. Deceased had been in poor health for some time and had been worrying over the outlook for the season. Several days ago he went to Petoskey to consult Dr. Rayzoff, who told him that his trouble was nervousness and that he must be careful or it would develop into something worse. From a remark he made Tuesday the idea got out that he had been thinking of suicide. Mr. Bartley was then fearful of approaching insanity. This morning he went to a neighbor's and started home about ten o'clock saying he was to fix a fence. That was the last seen of him alive. Deceased was 49 years of age and was one of the earlier residents of this region.

TO SELL PERE MARQUETTE

Final Hearing to Be July 8 and Sale Made about the First of October.

Details of a plan to sell the Pere Marquette railroad to liquidate its receivers' debts and its $20,000,000 debt to the consolidated bondholders, will be completed July 8, when creditors will assemble before Judge Tuttle in federal court. The road will be sold on Oct. 1, an upset price of $10,000,000 having been named.

At a meeting before Judge Tuttle on June 7, when the junior bondholders filed a petition covering the receivers' debts, June 28 was set as the date of the final hearing. Since then it was determined to postpone it until July 8, because some minor details of the sale had not been agreed upon by the creditors.

DIAZ EST MORTE

Porfirio Diaz, former dictator of Mexico, is dead in France.

For twenty-five years the Diaz government was a despotism, but Mexico prospered and enjoyed a quarter of a century of peace. Upon the slightest sign of insurrection a firing squad finished it.

A ruler of the Diaz sort is what Mexico needs today. Like Richelieu, Diaz was cruel, but he was just.

J. P. MORGAN SHOT.

An over-educated crank blew up a small section of the capitol at Washington, one day last week, and then went to New York and shot J. P. Morgan, the financier, because he did not stop the war.

The mistake of the assassin was that he shot the wrong Kaiser.

Morgan will recover, but the other Kaiser will go on killing men, women and children in order to perpetuate German "kultur."

Which is the crazier of the two, Holt the over-educated maniac, or Wilson, the self-annointed ambassador of the Most High?

The steamship Minnesota of the Northern Michigan Transportation Co. line arrived from Chicago Friday morning on her first trip of the season for Buffalo. She filled the Wilbur dock and a little more. She is the largest boat that ever docked at this harbor, being 295 feet long, 41 feet beam, of 22 feet depth, and 2100 net tonnage. She is commanded by Capt. George Johnson, formerly of the steamer Menistee of the same line. Capt. Johnson is a Grand Traverse boy, having been born near Traverse City. He is a son of the late Capt. Fred Johnson, a Grand Traverse bay pioneer, who was master of the Hannah & Lay steamer Sunnyside, which was lost on the beach at the mouth of this river the fall of 1867.

CHAPTER XVII—Continued.

"For a moment the click of the balls on the other tables was the only sound. Craig broke the tableau by reaching for his glass of whisky, which he emptied. He tried to assume a nonchalant air, but his hand shook as he replaced the glass on the sideboard. It rolled off to the floor and tinkled into pieces.

"Nerves a bit rocky, eh?" Warrington laughed sardonically.

"You're screeching in the wrong jungle, Parrot, old top," said Mallow, who, as he did not believe in ghosts, was physically not morally afraid of anything. "Enough you have my word for it that I'd like to see you lose every cent of your old dollies."

"Don't doubt it."

"But," Mallow went on, "if you're waking a little ungrateful, you don't require pencils or voices, why, you're free. You don't owe a cent to my friend Craig coming alive."

"On the contrary, he'll make a good witness of what happens."

"The chit, boy!" Mallow paid the reckoning. "Now, then, coming, all the rickshaws!" he called.

The barren plot of ground back of the dock was deserted. Warrington himself from his rickshaw and dismissed all the coolies but one, and sent his hat beside it. Glenholly as a boy Mallow did likewise. Warrington, as he shaded the coolies to move back to the road.

"Rounds!" inquired Mallow.

"You filthy scoundrel, you know very well there won't be any rules in this game. Don't you think I know you?" Warrington rolled up his sleeves and was pleased to note the dull color of Mallow's face. He was not to rouse the brute in the man, then he would have him at his mercy. "I know four years ago that I'd make you pay for that night."

"Yes, you said that," replied Mallow, "you'll never be a whole man when they carry you away from here."

"Wait and see."

On the way to the dock Warrington had mapped out his campaign. Fair play from either of these men was not to be entertained for a moment. One was naturally a brute and the other was a coward. They would not heat into a manly defense him. And he knew what contest would mean at their hands—disfigurement, probably.

"Will you take a shilling for your fifty quid?" inquired Craig. He was going to enjoy this, for he had not the least doubt as to the outcome. Mallow was without superior in a fracas and tumble fight.

Warrington did not reply. He walked cautiously toward Mallow. The massive brute had his long arms reach. It was not a fair blow, but Warrington delivered it without the least compunction. It crack like crack squarely on the jaw. Lightly as a cat Warrington jumped back. Craig's knees doubled under him and he sprawled prone on his face.

"Now, Mallow, you and I alone, with no one to jump on my back when I'm looking sideways—"

Mallow appreciating the trick, came finally, and rushed. Warrington jabbed with his left and sidestepped. One thing he could do and that was to keep Mallow from getting into close quarters. The coarse grower was more than his match in the knowledge of close original devices their usually cripple a man. He had seen a man thus down scientifically; he must depart upon his ring generalship. In his youth Warrington had been a skillful boxer. He could now back this skill with unusual health and a blow that had a hundred and eighty pounds behind it.

From ordinary rage Mallow fell into a frenzy, and frenzy never won a fray battle. Time after time he endeavored to grapple, but always that left stopped him. Warrington played for his face, and to each job he added a taunt. "That for the little Hungarian!" "Consat that one for Wheedon's broken kneesa!" "And wouldn't Sam admire that? Remember best? The little Japanese girl whose thumbs you broke—Here's one for her!" It was not disciplined, but Warrington stubbornly refused to look back upon this day either with shame or regret. Jabjah, cat and skinl! Well the left. There was no more mercy in the mind back of it than might be found in the shed fellows who stalked the jungles north. Doggedly Mallow fought on, hoping for his chance. He tried every trick he knew, but he could only get so near. The ring was as wide as the world; there were no corners to make grappling a possibility.

Some of his desperate blows got through. The beast of his ring laid upon Warrington's forehead. He was brave enough, but he began to realize that this was not the same man he had turned out into the night four years ago. And the pain and tenacity he had forced upon others was now being returned to him. Warrington would have continued the battle had he not seen Craig getting dizzily to his feet. It was time to end the faintest activity. Mallow, expecting a body blow, dropped his guard. Warrington, as he struck, felt the bones in his hand crack. Mallow went over, upon his back, fairly knocked out. He was tough, an ordinary man would have died.

"I believe that squares accounts," Warrington, speaking to Craig. "If you hear of me in America, in Europe, anywhere, keep away from the place where I'm likely to be. Tell him," with an indifferent jerk of his head toward the insensible Mallow, "tell him that I give him that fifty pounds with the greatest good pleasure. Sorry I can't wait."

He turned and left the dock, walking, he stood from his feet, put on his hat and coat, and ordered the special coolie to hurry back to town. He never saw Mallow or Craig again. The battle itself became a hazy incident. In life affairs of this order generally have abrupt endings.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Two Letters.

And all that day Elsa had been waiting patiently to hear sounds of Warrington in the next room. Never could she recall such long, weary hours. Time and again she changed a piece of ribbon, a bit of lace, and twice she changed her dress, all for the purpose of making the hours pass more quickly. Whenever Martha approached Elsa told her that she wanted nothing that she was hungry, and wanted to be left alone. Discreetly Martha vanished.

To prevent the possibility of missing him, Elsa had engaged the room to listen. Hour dragged downward and to report to her the moment Warrington arrived. This boy came pattering up at a quarter to six.

"He come, He downside. I go he come topside."

"No. That will be all."

"Five following ten minutes tested her patience to the utmost. Presently she heard the hallway door open. She was there. What was she going to say to him? The trembling that seized at her knees was wholly a sensation. Presently the corner died away, but it left her weak. She sagged toward his door and knocked gently on the panel.

She heard something click as it struck the floor. (It was Warrington's cuff, which he had carried for seven years, now in smithereens.) She saw a hand, raw knuckled and bleeding slightly, catch at the curtain and swing it back upon its rings.

"Miss Chatwood!" he said.

"Yes . . . Oh, you've been hurt!" she exclaimed, noting the gash upon his forehead. A strip of tissue paper (in lieu of court plaster) was making upon that wound—a trick learned in the old days when razors grew dull overnight.

"Hurt? Oh, I ran against something when I wasn't looking." he explained lamely. Then he added eagerly: "I did not know that you were on the gallery, first time I've put up at a hotel in years." It did not serve.

"You have been fighting! Your hand!"

He looked at the hand dimly. How keen her eyes were.

"Mallow? Did you whip him?"

Elsa, did imitation of tone and hesitance. It was the whole thing he could have done, for it revealed the nerve of both of them.

Elsa smiled, smiled and forgot the letter of credit, warm with the heat of her heart. "I am a pagan." She confessed.

"And I am a barbarian. I ought to be horribly ashamed of myself."

"But you are not."

For a moment their eyes drew, lines were like dark whirlpools, and he felt himself drifting helplessly, irresistibly. He dropped his hands upon the railing and gripped, the illusion of getting a current was absent to him. Every fiber in his body cried out against the struggle.

"No, not in the least," he said, looking upward the moment he. "Fighting is riff-raff business, and I'm only a riff-raff at best."

"You aren't you Paul Allison, brother, twin brother, of the man I said I was going home to marry?"

How far away her voice seemed! The throb in his forehead and the dull ache over his heart, where some of the sledge-hammer blows had gone home, he no longer felt.

"Don't deny it. It would be useless. Knowing your brother as I do, who could doubt it?"

He remained dumb.

"I confess I understand, just simply couldn't. They never told me; in all the years I have known them, in all the years I have partly made their home my own. Mother was nothing. Not a trinket. Once I saw a camera picture, there, I think, with Aylmer mentioned it from my hand. I'm sorry. You were binding over an engineer's trip, pod. From now I should have doubted had I not recalled what you said one day on yard, that you had built bridges. Arthur couldn't build anything stronger than an artist's easel. You are, you found out."

"Why?"

"Because I wanted to be no more than an incident in your life. Just Parrot & Co."

"Parrot & Co.!"

It was like a caress; but he was too dull to sense it, and she was unconscious of the infection. The burning sensitive gave to his hair and beard the glistening of ruddy gold. Her imagination, full of announcement poetry at this moment, clothed him in the metals of a viking. There were other whirlpools besides those in her eyes, but Elsa did not sense the drifting as he had done. It was insidious.

"An incident," she repeated.

"Could I be more?" with sudden fierceness. "Could I be any more to any woman's life? I take myself for what I am, but the world will always take me for what I have done. Yet, I am Paul Allison, forgotten. I know by all those who knew me. Why did you seek me that night? Why did you come into my life to make bitterness become despair? The blackest kind of despair. Elsa Chetwood, Elsa! . . . Well, the consul is right. I am a sinner man. I can go out of your life, at least physically. I can say that I love you, and I can add to that goodbye?"

His wheels abruptly and went quickly down the gallery, barricaded, without any destination in his mind, with only one thought, to leave her before he lost the last shreds of his self-control.

It was then that Elsa knew her heart, she has spoken truth. She was a pagan—for, had he turned and held out his hands, she would have gone into them with him, anywhere in the world, lawfully or unlawfully.

Elsa said, When Martha came to help her dress for dinner she still sang. It was a wordless song, a song of joy that every human heart contains and which finds expression but once. Elsa loved.

Doubt, that arch-enemy of love and faith and hope, could had spread its dark pinions and flown away into yesterday. She felt the zest and exhilaration of a bird when it sings in the dawn. Once she slipped from Martha's ministrant hands and ran out upon the gallery.

"Elsa, your waist!"

Elsa laughed and held out her bare arms to the faded sky where but a little while since, the sun had burned a pathway down the world. All in an hour, one small trifling space of time, this wonderful, magical thing had happened. He loved her. There had been hunger for her in his voice, in his blue eyes. Presently she was going to make him feel very sorry that he had not taken her in his arms, then and there.

"Elsa, what in mercy's name possesses you?"

"Hush, Martha, mad as a March hare, whatever that is!" She loved.

"People will think so, if they happen to come along and see that waist. Please come instantly and let me finish hooking it. You act like you did when you were ten. You never would stand still."

"Yes, and I remember how you used to rain so plaintive. I haven't really forgiven you yet."

"I believe it's going home that's the matter with you. Well, I for one shall be glad to leave this horrid country. Unknown everywhere, in your room, at your table, under your feet. Ass in the street, Chinaman and Malaya and Hindoo, and I don't know what other outlandish name and tribe. Why, what's all this?" cried Martha, bending to the floor.

Elsa ran back to the room. She gave a little gasp when she saw what it was that Martha was holding up for her inspection. It was Warrington's letter of credit. She had totally forgotten it. Ashamed, Martha could not help seeing it. Elsa explained frankly what it was and how it had come into her possession. Martha was horrified.

"Elsa, they might have entered your room; and your jewels lying about everywhere. How could you be so careless?"

"But she didn't. I'll return this to Mr. Warrington in the morning; perhaps tonight, if I see him at dinner."

"He was in the next room, and we never knew it! The final hook snapped to my waist. "Well, Wednesday our boat leaves;" as if this put a period to all further discussion upon Mr Parrot & Co. Nothing very serious could happen between that time and now.

Wednesday night! Elsa began to sing again, but not so joyously. The pretty things of every-day life were lifting their heads once more, and of necessity she must recognize them.

Informally. There was gay inconsequential chatter, an exchange of recollections and experiences of cities and countries they had visited at separate times, but neither she nor he mentioned the chief subject of their thoughts. She refrained because of a strange yet natural shyness of a woman who has found herself; and he because from his angle of vision it was best that Warrington should learn of her his as suddenly and mysteriously as he had entered it. Like a speaker frankly he would have saved Elsa many a bitter heartache, many a weary day.

Warrington was absent, and so were his enemies. If there was any truth in reincarnation Elsa was confident that in the splendid days of Rome she had been her plain palms to any plaque of the gladiators. Pagan, she was all of that; for she knew that she could have looked upon Mallow's face with more than ordinary interest, Nevermore would her cheeks burn at the recollection of the man's look.

In her room later, she wrote two letters. The one to Arthur covered several pages; the other consisted of a single line. She went down to the office, mailed Arthur's letter and left the note in Warrington's key box. It was not an intentionally cruel letter she had written to the man in Annam; but if she had striven toward that object she could not have succeeded it more successfully. Her pride against the way he had treated his brother, the false pride that had bled den all knowledge of him from her view save the chastity and severity of which he had so often preached! Pages of burning reproaches which poured the cup to the lees with real pain to come along and see that waist.

"I Am Going to My Room."

she was determined to go downstairs. Elsa was excited, she brimmed with exuberance; she wanted Romance to begin at once.

"Good morning," she greeted the consul general, who was breakfasting alone.

"Well, you're as early bird!" he replied. By the way, our remedy Forest & Co. have gone."

"Gone?" Elsa stared at him.

"Yes. Sailed for Saigon at dawn, and I am rather glad to see him go. I was afraid he might interest you too much. Good heavens, Elsa, what is the matter?"

"No, no! Don't touch me. I'm not the fainting lilly! Did you know they sailed?"

"Yes."

"I shall never forgive you. Never, never! You know and did not tell me. Do you know who Paul Allison is? He is the brother of the man at home. You knew he was stealing away and did not tell me."

She could not have made the truth any plainer to him. He sat back in his chair, amazed, voiceless.

"I am going to my room," she said. "Do not follow. Please act as if nothing had happened."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

SOOTHED THE CRYING CHILD

Escaping Convict Proved to Mother That She Need Have No Fear in His Presence.

Tenderly petting a young and crying baby which he had lifted from its crib, escaped convict Peter Tosti succeeded in convincing Mrs. Charles Gaffney of Bath, Mich., that after he had gulped escapes to her home, that he would not harm her or her two children.

Tosti told Mrs. Kelley that all he wanted was something to eat and a change of wearing apparel for his prison stripes.

Mrs. Kelley was awakened by the crying of her two babies, who had been disturbed by the convict. As she swung she saw Tosti pick up the younger one and soothingly begin to rock it. He kept this up until the child fell asleep. Nothing that Mrs. Kelley was awake, Tosti addressed her, saying:

"Don't be afraid. I am fond of children and I would not harm a hair of like these—or their mother."

After this he kept up a running flow of conversation, and as soon as he had foraged in the kitchen for some victuals he left, apologizing for his intrusion. With Tosti went Mrs. Kelley's husband's overcoat.

Tosti had served only two years of a five-year sentence for manslaughter committed in Merced county when he escaped from San Quentin.

Dying War Horses.

Ever since the war broke out experiments have been made with a view to finding a drug that will cure horses, but simple as it may seem to the uninitiated a satisfactory result has not yet been obtained. Numerous inventors came forward with wonderful cures, but after the publication of only one liquid seemed to realize the such satisfactorily. A battery of 24 white horses was consecutively treated, and well out on duty in all weather. When the experiment ended a week or ten days all the beasts were of a number of years, sound and sound. Knowing your brother as I do, who could doubt it?"

He remained dumb.

"I confess I understand, just simply couldn't. They never told me; in all the years I have known them, in all the years I have partly made their home my own. Mother was nothing. Not a trinket. Perils of College Life for One Who Is Not a Christian

By REV. HOWARD W. POPE, Superintendent of Men, Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.

TEXT—Having no hope, and without God in the world.—Ephesians 2:12.

Without Christ you can never have a satisfactory philosophy of life. "Whence did I come? What am I here for? Whither or am I going?" These are questions which will forever remain unanswerable. Life will be an enigma, and doubts will darken on your divine hour. Become acquainted with Christ and doubts begin to disappear. You are what you ought to be. You also discover how this change is to be wrought—through Christ's death for you on Calvary, and the reproduction of his life in you by the Holy Spirit. This is no dream or fiction, but a blessed reality, and he who commits the keeping of his life to the Lord Jesus will soon find it so.

2. Without Christ you can never do your best work. You have latent able cravings which no one can satisfy but the Lord Jesus. The soul of man of energy which no one can dispel, and powers of useful ness which no one can develop so well as the Lord Jesus Christ is as indispensable to a thinking man as sunshine is to a garden. Once she slipped from Martha's ministrant hands and ran out upon the gallery.

"Elsa, your waist!"

Housework Is a Burden

If a hard enough job, but when it is perfect health, but a woman who is tired, tired and suffering from an aching back has a heavy burden.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

John Henry Has a Musical

SAY! DID you ever stray away from home of an evening and go to one of those parlor rifles?

Friend wife called it a musicale, but to me it looked more like a session of the Mexican congress in a boiler factory.

They polled it off at Mrs. Linde Prothingham's, over on the Drive.

I like Loella and I like her husband, Jack Prothingham, on the ground that he is a secret member of the Anvil Association when I whisper them what that the street in the glve a musical evening any salmon is from Avenue, corner of Foliage Street, in the woods.

The Prothinghams are nice people and old friends and they have more money than some folks have buy, but that doesn't give them a license to spoil one of my portectly good evenings by sprinkling a lot of canned music and professional entertainment over it.

The Prothinghams have a skeleton in their closet. He, name is Uncle Hack and he—wrake ZZT—and he for a skeleton. Uncle Hack is a Jos Morgan. His sole ambition in life is to hocage politely pickled and limed and draped over a cold chair in the drawing room when the high-class company present.

For that reason the Prothinghams are constantly put the skids under Uncle Hack and run him off stage till after the first curtain.

On some occasions Uncle Hack breaks through the barrier and dashes into the scene of refinement with merry gulp and jest to the confusion of his relatives and the life-concealing amusement of their guests.

This was one of those occasions. Jack Prothingham, in the evening, had a Uncle Hack in his room, sat him in front of a quart of vintage and left the old geezer turn to stand around in the surf until sleep claimed him for its own.

But before the wine was gone Uncle Hack got on the glove with Mrs. Prothingham, got the decision, marched down stairs and into the drawing room.

Rufus apologized and said he'd do the trick over again if someone would put him a hat, but nothing doing. We all preferred our eggs boiled.

Then we had Claribel Mendrosa in perfect rectoriums, she was all the money.

Claribel grabbed "The Wreck of the Hesperus" between her pearly teeth and shook it to death. Then she got a ballad-lesion on Poe's "Raven" and put it out of business.

Next she tried the imitation of the balcony scene from "Romeo and Juliet." If Juliet talked like that dame did no wonder she took poison.

Then Claribel let down her back hair and started in to give us a real scene—and it was. Everybody in the room cried and wept.

When peace was finally restored, Mr. Prothingham informed us that the rest of the "paid" talent had disappointed her and didn't have to depend on her voice. Then she whispered to Miss Gladiola Hungerschutz, whom I know, who kept on playing her way over to the piano and began to knock its teeth out.

The way Gladiola went after one of Beethoven's sonatas and slapped its ears was pitiful.

Gladiola learned to lapture a plate at a conservatory of music, she can talk a symphony rapidly and turn it into a goulash in about 45 bars.

In the middle of the sonata we all applauded Gladiola just as loudly as we could, in the hope that she would turn with surprise and stop playing, but no such luck.

She tried a couple of chords together and swung that piano like a pair of Indian clubs.

First she did "My Old Kentucky Home," with variations, until everybody who had a home began to weep for fear it might get to be like her Kentucky home.

The variations were where she made a mistake and struck the right note.

Then Gladiola moved in to the squeaky end of the piano and gave an imitation of a Swiss music box.

It sounded to me like a Swiss chalet.

Presently Gladiola ran out on raw material, and splashed, which she succeeded her welcome disappointment, and two very theatrical gents arrived to talk fast to Gladiola so as to take her mind off the piano.

This evening I was introduced by another catastrophe named Minnehaha Jones, who kept us in a state of suspense and screeched them at us.

Minnehaha is one of those fearless singers who vocalize without a safety pin, and always manages to get disclosed, so she can't tell just when her corset-cover is going to come unloosed.

The next treat was a mixed duet on the flute and trombone between Clarence Jones and Percy Dillingham, with a violin obligato on the side by Professor Tompkins.

Never before have I seen music so roughly handled.

It looked like a walk-over for Clarence, but in the 8 a round he blew a couple of grand notes and Percy got the decision.

Then for a consolation prize, Percy lost out in the middle of the room, when he assassinated Mascagni's "Intermezzo" so mercilessly that it will never be able to enter a decent child of refinement's home.

Almost before the audience had time to recover from the shock of Mascagni's demise, Percy was coaxed to sing Tosti's "Good-bye."

I am very fond of sister Jean's, but I'm afraid if Mr Tosti ever heard her sing his "Good-bye" he would say, "Tosti, you take back your song, and here's your hat."

Then Jean's husband, Fred, and myself Wat I remember she had a very pretty mezzo-soprano voice, but she's been so long away from home that she forgot to make Minnehaha famous that nowadays the accompanist is expected to sit down and play the music for the singer, not the decision, marched down stairs and into the drawing room.

Then Clarilet Let Down Her Hair and Screeched Her Way Through Some Of Her Stuff—and It Was.

where he immediately insisted upon doing his little stunt.

Uncle Hack moved and recorded that he was a ventriloquist and proud of it. Jean's husband, Fred, sat in one corner and made a turkey gobble and a hen cackle and a rooster crow and the guests were amazed at the skill with which he could do it.

Then Fred sat in the middle of the pantry hoping to do an Omar Khayam with the pieces of the dishes and a good time was had by all.

Uncle Hack's specialty was a bird call, and he was a good one, too! Let me sit down a minute, I think I'm going to faint.

But it wasn't a stone, and it didn't get time to faint, it was a genuine salad and it got into his face when the Irish cook threw it at him for interfering with her dishes.

"I'm discouraged," murmured Uncle Hack, as he wiped his face away from with manifiment noises on the sofa in the library.

There were present at the battle in the drawing room Uncle Peter Grant and Aunt Marbled, the jewelers, the diamond shirt studs; Dutch Jefferson and his wife, Lizzie; Hiram Jones and his second wife; Phil Merton and his third wife; Dave Mason and his stenomary secretary, Miss Jones, and his wife, Jennie, who is Peaches' sister, and a few other high-class people whose names omitted.

The meal revels were inaugurated by the Tipple brothers, who attempted to drag some growthy music out of guitars that didn't want to give up. The Tipple brothers part their hair in the middle and have to do this once in a while to keep from being mistaken from the Hobos In Joyland on their mandolins as an encore.

If Victor Herbert ever catches them there'll be a couple of shine chorus choikers way to the front.

When the Tipple brothers took a bow they had to pick up the pieces of flowers we were all invited to listen to a soprano solo by Miss Imogene Glass Jones.

When Imogene slaps she makes faces at a tenorish tune, and when a high note she goes after it like a hen after a toothy. Imogene sang "Bring Back Your Smile" and didn't bring the smile with her voice.

Then we had Nutra Kellar Smith, the parlor prestidigitator. Nutra was a bad boy.

He cooked an omelet in a silk hat and when he handed the hat back to Hiry Hardy (we pronounce it—H ard and cuddled up to Hep's hair.

It sounded to me like a Swiss chalet.

Presently Gladiola ran out on raw material, and splashed, which she succeeded her welcome disappointment, and two very theatrical gents arrived to talk fast to Gladiola so as to take her mind off the piano.

This evening I was introduced by another catastrophe named Minnehaha Jones, who kept us in a state of suspense and screeched them at us.

marks, which in their original state form the basis of a Scotch ballad called "Loch Lomond."

Fred's system of speaking the English language is to say with his voice as much of a word as he can remember and then finish the rest of it with his hands.

Imagine what Bud would do to a song with an entire ballad called "Loch Lomond."

When Bud barked out the first few bars, which say "By yon bonnie bank and by yon bonnie brae," everybody within hearing would have cried with joy if the piano had fallen over on him and fastened his equator.

And when he reached the plot of the piece, where it says, "You take the high road and I'll take the low road," Uncle Peter took a drink, Phil Merton took the same, Hub took an oath and I took a walk.

And all the while Bud's wife sat there, with the glad and winning smile

Lost the Point.

Jones who always takes a joke, but like many others, cannot repeat one to save his life, was telling Smith for the first time the joke about the dog being the most musical of animals. Tom Jones he wears a brass band round his neck," and determined to spring it on Smith, who is a musical fiend, as he was invited. The time came, and he identified his victim with the exclamation, "I say, I've a really good one!" He asked, "Why is a dog the most musical of animals?" They gave it up. "Because," announced Jones, triumphantly, "he wears a brass collar round his neck."

Slightly Mixed

The ex-bishop of Manchester, the Rev. Moorhouse, was one of the most hapless and without of churchmen, and was never more pleased with himself than when telling a good story. One of his favorites was that of the old lady who started a dressmaking business from inn India with a question which showed how decorous a little knowledge is. "Pray, my lord," said she, "is it true that in India you call the female converts sensana and the male converts bananas?"

Black Foxes Hard to Raise.

Constitutio Vitorio, who developed in captivity by that valuable fur-bearer, the black fox, has left Canada for the Sahara to raise the fox-raising industry of Prince Edwards Island, where the commercial fox is in the last throes. Pups are frequently eaten by their parents and there are also instance of females being killed and partially eaten by their mates.

One Explanation.

A reporter on a country paper had visited the court for a number of days in succession, attracted by a pretty face and he complained: "What the reason there is no crime stuff around this city more lately, I don't know." Gray Hen's chauffeur's chauffeur, a near-retired man who thinks hard about trifles. "That is true," replied Mike Carsons. "When I was a criminal people I know I can always tempt me to say 'why' instead of 'how.'"

Sensible.

"The greeting, 'How are you?' doesn't seem to me to express any sincere and sensible inquiry," remarked the man who thinks hard about trifles. "That is true," replied Mike Carsons. "When I meet a criminal people I know I can always tempt me to say 'why' instead of 'how.'"

THE SANDMAN STORY By Mrs. F. A. WALKER

WHAT THE OLD GRAY HEN SAW

"No," said the Old Gray Hen, "I do not think the Duck knows a bit more about the world than I do, just because she swims. If it wasn't for her Sunday, she wouldn't know whether it was sunset or sunrise."

"But she has traveled farther than you have," said the Pig, raising her head from the muddy bed. "I saw her swim across to the other side of the pond the other day."

"What if she did? I have walked away through the woods to the other side."

"She never could do that," said the Rooster, who happened along just then. "Her feet are too large."

"And she never leaves the ground," said the Gray Hen. "She cannot fly. I do fairly around your pen, Madam Pig. Whatever made you think the White Duck was wise about the world?"

"Well," said the Pig, "she told me that the day while she was sailing along on the pond she saw a turtle on the bank, and that it had a shell which it carried on its back all the time, and that when anyone went near it or it was afraid, it drew in its head and legs, and nothing could hurt it. Just think of sense anything so wonderful," said the Pig.

"Oh, that's nothing," said the Gray Hen, "I saw one myself, and I saw the dog bark at it, and the turtle stepped and caught him by the nose."

"You didn't tell me!" said the Pig. "Did the dog shake it off?"

"Not until the master pulled the turtle by the tail," said the Hen.

"Well," said the Pig, "the Duck told me she saw an elephant one day on the other side of the pond."

"Oh, oh," laughed the Hen, "that Duck is a quack."

"Well, I don't know," said the Pig, "but she seemed to know a great deal about the world."

"The White Duck is an awful brag," said the Gray Hen as she walked away, and she walked to the pond and looked across.

"I really would like to see the country over there," she said, "but I never can swim that's certain." Just then she saw a frog and she hopped on to the side. Then she saw a worm in the bottom of the boat, and she hopped down to eat it, and the dog who had come along just then, and the worm stopped to get a drink and pushed the boat, and off it drifted into the mid-dle of the pond.

"What in the world has happened?" said the Duck, looking up from the worm; "Why I am in the middle of the pond. What will I ever do? I cannot fly out of the boat, for I can-not swim, and how will I ever get to the other side?"

The boat drifted around with the Gray Hen perched on the seat.

"Well," she said, "I can see the other side of the pond and if there are any animals I hope I shall see one."

Just then the boat bumped into a rock on the opposite side of the pond and the Gray Hen hopped out.

This is just like a trip across the world," she thought as her feet touched and looking around. She walked into the woods and picked the berries she could reach and was quite delighted with her adventure, when all at once she saw an animal sitting on a rock. It held something in its paws which it would bite and then turn its head quickly from side to side, and over its back was a bushy tail.

She Has Traveled Farther Than

"Mercy me," said Gray Hen, "what is that? I wonder if that can be an animal?"

"Where did you come from?" asked the squirrel.

"I sailed across from the other side," Gray Hen answered.

"I did not know that Jens could swim," said the squirrel.

"I did not swim," said Gray Hen; "I sailed across in a boat."

"Who is with you?" asked the squirrel, staring to her.

"No one," answered Gray Hen

GALLIPOLI GUARDS TURKISH PENINSULA

Was Once a Beautiful City, but Has Gone to Decay.

Washington.—The city of Gallipoli, toward which the allied forces are fighting, guards the neck of the Gallipoli peninsula, where the Dardanelles leaves the mainland, near the elbow formed by the Dardanelles strait and the Sea of Marmora," begins a bulletin issued by the National Geographic society. The description of this key position to the best protected of all the world's water avenues, a position to which the interest of all the nations is now turned with much questioning, continues:

"Gallipoli is the best fortified town of the Dardanelles, and assumes Mahomedan as a Turkish base. It is a picturesquely fortified city, its defensive works having been begun in modern style in 1878, when the Russians threatened to take possession of Constantinople. The work of strengthening this port has been carried on at irregular intervals since. When the Bulgarians were attacking the lines at Chataldja, the Turks, who felt that they might expect an endeavor to turn their flanks by way of Gallipoli and Marmora sea, worked feverishly upon the port's redoubts. While Gallipoli is not comparable in strength to the greatest fortresses of Europe, it, nevertheless, with its modern interior and extensive outworks, forms a proper conclusion to the inability fortified water lane leading down to the Aegean sea.

"This city, beautiful of the Greeks and Romans, was the first point in Europe to be won and assimilated by the Ottoman horde. It is today anything but a beautiful city. Its streets are narrow, intolerably foul and dirty, while most of its houses are overhung wooden structures, in which decay and neglect add to an unpleasing picture. There are few buildings of any architectural interest, though the great head on domed bastions speak to the imagination of the wayfarer. Some few and uncared for relics of ancient empire and Grecian times have been left to mental decay by the Turks.

"Until Turkish occupation and the rolling into effect of the sanjiniak in Islamic and absolutistic policies of extinction and extinctiveness of the ancient Gallipoli seemed destined, as a well placed port upon one of nature's natural avenues of water traffic, to become one of the greatest of all the commercial cities of the near east. Throughout the ravenous rule of Turkish rule it has kept an almost dreamless sleep. Today, with a population of 25,000, with few ambitions and little understanding of its advantages, it has, however, under the Young Turk regime, given some evidence of a reawakening."

ELECTRIC SPARKING.

Light on a Puzzle That Has Worried Many Car Owners.

It is a and and common experience to stop in motorcars, automobiles, etc., to find that something is wrong with the spark. Often it is the case that when the spark plug is taken out and rested in air it shows up all right, and will create sparks pounded around it, but when put back into position it will not work. This is a puzzle to a great many people today.

The reason this is the simple fact that the spark, when it takes place in the cylinder, has to work in compressed gas, and when in the air it doesn't. It is a well known scientific fact that the pressure of the gas determines how far a spark will jump under a given current. If the spark jumped a quarter inch in the open air and was placed in a vessel with most of the air pumped out, it would jump several inches; and, on the other hand, if placed in compressed air it would not jump more than a fraction of the quarter inch. Of course the thing to do in the circumstances is to get new batteries, and it so situated that that is impossible the two little terminals of the spark plug should be pushed closer together. Then the spark will pass in the compressed gas inside the cylinder.

If automobiles do not take place then the spark is probably so small that it is wholly unnecessary either in air or the gasoline vapor, and to have an explosion it must be immersed in a mixture of the two. The ignition should then be taken in with. The probabilities are that a part of the time explosions will take place and will be sufficient to keep up a forward motion at reduced speed.—Chicago Herald.

SQUIRRELS DIG UP FOSSILS.

Little Diggers Reveal Ancient Indian Graveyard.

Santa Monica, Cal.—A peculiar discovery has been made of a fossil bed up the coast at the mouth of Tujunga canyon. Some years ago a man living there unearthed some curious specimens of fossils and supposed Indian bones. Recently a large lump of black dirt was noticed at the edge of the beach, and upon investigation it proved to be the burrow of a family of squirrels.

The little diggers had piled up on the surface of the sandy soil perhaps 200 pounds of black sand, in which were piles of clam shells, fossils and bits of human bone. There were even rocks weighing close to two pounds. The dirt was just as it had been dumped by the animals, and bones and fossils were mixed together with the rocks and sand. The bones have been identified as those of human beings, several specimens showing conclusively that they at one time constituted the framework of a stalwart Indian brave.

Theories have been advanced by men interested in osteology, but no definite conclusion have been reached. They think that the bones are those of Indians, but that they are hundreds of years old. The squirrels must have burrowed many feet, or one the bones in the years just was nearer to the mountains than it is at present.

That is natural, for the change is made by the yearly washing of quantities of sand and rocks from the hillsides down to the mouth of the canyon. The old burying ground is now probably many feet below the surface, and only the busy little ground squirrels know the exact location of the rest of the bones.

No Explanations Needed.

The lady jury was out longer than the importance of the case warranted. The judge grew impatient.

"What's the trouble in there?" he said to the bailiff.

"I'll see," replied the bailiff.

"Hold on," cried the judge. "Tell 'em if there's any knotty points about the case that bother them they should appeal to me."

"Yes, your honor."

The bailiff goes to the door of the jury room and returns.

"Well?"

"They ain't got to the case yet, your honor. They're still discussing the plaintiff's clothes."—Baltimore American.

GUNPOWDER.

Some in Which the Perforated Grains Are Three Inches Long.

The biggest in the world under the grain of powder. For the rifles the men carry the grains are half a lig as a pinhead. For the largest guns they are three-inches long and three-quarters of an inch thick. Every grain is perforated lengthwise. Small grains blow a single hole, while the largest blow five holes.

These holes regulate in a wonderful way the rapidity with which the powder will burn. If you light a scrap of paper all round the edge it will burn toward the center and the burning surface will steadily decrease. If, however, you made a hole in the center of the paper and start the conflagration there the flame will steadily grow, and the most rapid burning will take place just before the fire has reached the outer edge. This is the exact principle which governs the arrangement of the perforations in big gunpowder. The burning starts along the surface exposed by the perforations and spreads always faster as the hole is enlarged, burning fastest at the instant it is consumed.

It is not intended that the charge in big guns shall exhaust its force in a stately, says William Atherton Dugan, writing on "Powder For the World's Guns." The beginning of the explosion starts the projectile on its way. The expansion continues, and as the projectile gains speed the force behind it continues to push. The powder is burning fastest and pushing hardest at the instant the projectile reaches the mouth of the gun. At that instant also it burns out and exhausts itself. Its work is done.—Pearson's Weekly.

French Foreign Legion.

It is the boast of the French Foreign Legion that it never lacks recruits from its own ranks to meet any contingency. The commander once told his men he were capable not only of winning a war, but of writing its history. On one occasion, when a new barracks was being erected, the legion ranks supplied just a dozen genuine architects, and time and again on the battlefield, when the call has been for doctors, the legionaries have stepped forward and acknowledged their medical qualifications. Once, says tradition, when no padre was available to conduct a burial service, a legionaire stepped to the ranks. A man stepped out and saluted, then, "I was once a bishop."

King James, commenting three weeks had forsaken him, said, "And Est-ce-possible my son."

Grim Sort Wit.

A Scottish minister had among his parishioners a man who, in his drunkenness, alternating his spells of labor with periods of idleness, was subject to depression which followed each overindulgence. Him habitually took to pen and ink and diligently studied the family Bible. During one of these fits of attempted reformation the minister prompted his wife to call in the Rev. Mr. Walker, the parish bonhomie of all the time happened to be passing. "Oh, sister, he's come in and see our John; he's raie bad!"

"What's wrong wi' him?"

"He's fleet to read the Bukkert" and Mrs. Jo's.

Quick as fire came the crushing reply: "Humph! That'm he need no be feart for that; he'll never mar us."

Immortal Animals.

Some of the lower animals are immortal, living neither death nor death. The creature was never more clearly or scientifically expressed than by R. T. Coleridge in his "Encyclopedia Literaria" in a footnote to chapter iv on Wordsworth's "Lyrical Ballads" where he says:

"There is a sort of cinnin immortal among the animals-like infusoria which has not naturally either birth or death, absolute beginning or climax, and for at a certain period it seems at full point appears on to back, which degrees and lengthens till the creature divides into two, and the same process recommences in each of the halves now become integral."

VER in Ceylon the loyal natives have long called their beautiful island "Pearl-drop on the brow of India."

A name most appropriately bestowed when we recall that Ceylon waters its probably the oldest pearl-fishing grounds known to man. For thousands of years they have sent forth the choicest gems to adorn the crown of royal ruler or to adorn the bosom of the fairest queen of culture and wealth.

Shortly after nightfall of a pleasant evening our little steamer sailed out of the harbor of Colombo, bound for the "pearly shores," for an anchorage a few miles off the port of Aripo, near which place the pearl-fishing fleet was to be operating at the rising of the sun. In Ceylon the outer beds are under government supervision, and about March of each year a pearl-fishing expedition hovers over the waters of the Gulf of Mannar. The personnel of the fleet is made up of Malays, Arabs, Indians, Singhalese, and those from various other branches of India's teeming millions.

The experience of the stranger with the unique fleet is not disappointing. The sight of thousands of divers from hundreds of little boats, plunging into the water at regular intervals, astride heavy weights, rising with their treasures, others returning to the watery depths, the babel of strange voices combining to paint a picturesque and lasting impression upon the mind of the visitor.

The waters around Ceylon and those of the Gulf of California have the richest pearl-producing oyster beds in existence. Situated on opposite sides of the earth, it is interesting to compare the work of the pearl divers, or divers, as far separated, yet pursuing many methods in common in the search for precious gems beneath the waters. In Ceylon upon a given signal the diving begins; the boats are small and hold comparatively eight or twelve persons. The man wear few clothes, and each man takes a turn at diving, for all of them appear to be experts. A rope with weight attached is thrown over the side of the boat, the diver attaches himself to the rope, and he assistant lowers him into the water. Other divers plunge downward minded of. Around the diver's waist is a bag, into which he places the oysters as rapidly as he can pick them from the bottom.

On the Mexican coast, of which La Paz is the general rendezvous, the method of pearling is somewhat same as in Ceylon. Many of the vessels used are larger, and the modern diving suit is more in evidence. There is usually a diving bell attached "mother," and probably half a dozen smaller ones carried "tenders." The latter are manned by a crew of six or eight men, one or two of whom are divers. The small boats transfer their catches at frequent intervals, in the larger vessel standing by, where the shells are opened and carefully examined for pearls.

What is a pearl? Before considering other pearl-fishing grounds, especially those of the Americas, it may be of interest to know just how the pearl is produced; that is, so far as the science of the matter is concerned. One of the oldest and most striking definitions is that suggested by a French critic, who called it "a pearl is the brilliant aerolithe of a worm." Others go more into detail and declare that the growth of the pearl is often caused by the presence of a grain of annoyance or pain. The tiny dropsy of fluids itself within the shell of a mollusk or oyster may be introduced accidentally or purposely, as we shall see later. The foreign substance within the shell is believed to irritate the oyster and he begins to cover it with a series of thin layers of calcium carbonate. Little by little these regular layers are formed, and in a few years a beautiful pearl or pearls, as the case may be, are found, very prize absolutely worthless.

Pearl-forming mollusks are widely distributed over the world, and they may be univalves or bivalves; in the former shape we sometimes find them in conchs, and in the latter classification in clams and oysters. The subject is various, fascinating, and fascinate the fisheries of Ceylon or those of the Persian Gulf. Columbus, when he sailed in his wake, discovered uncivilized natives wearing pearls of great value, indeed, all many pearls were found off the Venezuelan coast time early explorers gave the name of "Gulf of Pearls" to certain waters where the pearls appeared to be plentiful.

Today the pearl fisheries of Margarita island, off the Venezuelan coast, became active early in the sixteenth century. The Spaniards established themselves on the Venezuelan company, engaged in the search for precious gems beneath of that country. Near the little port of Marito the results have proved quite satisfactory, and during a recent year about $20,000 worth of pearls were shipped to European markets.

Another fishery of numerous islands in the Bay of Panama there also pearl fishery. Many of the pearls found in the Panama waters in which fishing is done are from 20 to 50 feet deep, and the fleet is active four to six months in the year, beginning operations in the autumn. A pearling expedition as equipped for the Mexican waters costs $10,000 to $15,000 to outfit, and possibly at the end of the season the catch may not be worth the amount expended. But if no shipwreck occurs to any of the little vessels the supply of mother-of-pearl shells obtained should be of sufficient value to repay the general outfitting expenses.

One of the allied industries of pearl fishing is that of obtaining valuable shells, which we know as mother-of-pearl. The shell of this mollusk is generally along with the pearl fisheries; and often when no pearls exist within the oyster the shells are found in quantities of considerable value.

Mother-of-pearl is defined as the "internal iridescent lining of the mollusca shell." This shell, as it well known, is in general use in our homes, where it is highly prized for toilet articles, for handles to knives, for buttons, and countless other services where a high polish and lasting qualities are desired. The monks and other inhabitants of seaholds are said to be among the "oldest and skillful workers in mother-of-pearl shells; the beautiful ornaments that come from that ancient city are highly valued in leading cities of Europe and America.

Pearls in the Americas are in other countries. Mexico may be within the bounds of those of moderate sizes. Today in world markets of London, Amsterdam, Paris, that the pearl is selling for about half its ordinary value.

It is only the pearls from waters of the Americas are to be seen in the crowns of most European rulers. One of the most valuable pearls ever obtained in Mexican fisheries was sent to Paris and there sold to the emperor of Austria for $10,000. On another occasion the government of Spain presented to Napoleon III a black 36-grain pearl valued at $25,000. The combination fields of black, blue and green pearls found in the Mexican and Panama pearls often combine these colorings, and apparently have reached a perfection.

The Venezuelan fisheries produce annually more than half a million dollars' worth of pearls. Many of the world's most beautiful gems have come from that country, and it is said that in 1579 King Philip of Spain obtained from Isabel Margarita island a pearl weighing 250 grains, which was variously estimated to be worth $40,000 to $100,000. The most perfect pearl in the world, said to be Philippine, is a pear gem that is preserved in the Kremlin museum in Moscow; it weighs 28 carats, is globular in form and strikingly free from Indian waters. The world's largest pearl is in the Hope collection in the Victoria and Albert museum, London. It weighs three ounces and has a circumference of 4¼ inches.

Some of the world's leading authorities on pearls One of the most prominent is Dr. George F. Kunz, according to a recent issue of the Scientific American. He says that a pearl of the finest grade should have "a perfect skin, the finest or delicate texture, be free from specks or flaws, and be of translucent white color, with a subdued iridescence. It should be perfectly spherical, or if not, of symmetrical shape. White or pink pearls are the finest, owing to their delicate tints."

In China and Japan the mention of the pearl occurs in the history of those countries as early as 1900 B. C. Pearling industry in both nations has passed down through the ages, and is today it gives employment to many workers, skilled and unskilled. Visitors to Japan will be particularly interested in Mikimoto's pearl farms at Argo Bay; they are marvels of scientific accomplishment in the propagation of pearls. The methods pursued are more or less as follows: The young oysters are removed from the water, a wound is inserted into the shell; this substance gets up irritation within, and the oyster, in order to protect itself, covers the offensive foreign matter with layer after layer of calcareous deposits. A few years ago the oysters were taken in fields from the waters and his pearl-making work continued. Possibly a beautiful pearl may have been formed.

Many so-called pearls seen today are but imitations of the genuine article, and some of them are so cleverly constructed that a trained eye is required to see the deception.

Silver or fresh-water pearls are found quite generally in temperate climes of the northern hemisphere, especially in the British Isles, Saxony, Bavaria, Lombardy, Canada, and in many states of the United States, such as those of Ohio, in those of Wisconsin, Illinois, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Texas, Mississippi, and other states, pearls have been found from time to time that contained good pearls.

WHALING AS IT IS TODAY

Modern Methods Have Supplanted the Old-Time Ways Once Considered Dangerous.

At Rosoke Arm, on the east coast of Newfoundland, is a scientific whaling station. Here, as well as the great whaling stations of Iceland and Norway, specially constructed steamers are equipped, equipped with every appliance that said can devise

A small harpoon is no longer hurled by hand of some resolute Esk-Indians within a hundred yards of the whale. A man with steady nerves and quick aim is at the cannon and as soon as he sees the chance he fires the harpoon is hurled through the air with unerring aim it plunges into the whale's side, the wings on the cross bar suddenly fling hitherward and the explosive projectiles generating great volumes of gas that keep the body afloat. Death is very speedy and, at most without suffering if the range is not too close.

When the cannon is used at close quarters and the whale happens to be young, with tender, thin hide, the harpoon flies through the body, the rope holding the wounded creature fast, and men are dispatched to bore a hole in the prisoner. The whale is towed into the harbor and moored, to be dragged by a steam power capstan, giving chains up the slippery, slanting wharf.

HEROISM OF SKIPPER SOOEY

Brave Captain Inserted Himself in Rent in Steamer's Side and Saved Craft.

When news of the heroic exploit of Skipper "Hi" Sooey of the good ship Henry Summers reaches the British shores, the admiralty will undoubtedly seek out Skipper Sooey for special service in the submarine zone, according to the New York correspondent of the Cincinnati Times-Star. For here is a skipper who saved his ship from certain loss, under circumstances closely approaching those of the submarine menace, and did it all himself personally and unaided, but distinctly in person and by that means alone.

Though not an imposing craft, the Henry Summers is well and more or less fairly known, she—adopting the romantic terminology of the sea to the Henry Summers—sticks people down to the fishing banks to catch fish, or, at least, to spend the day trying. Her personnel, in active service, consists of Skipper "Hi" and the cook and crew, whose name is "Bill." Coming up the East river, after a successful trip to the banks, having discharged her cargo of fish, fishermen, bait, and bottles at the battery, the Henry Summers hit something. It was a floating mine or a torpedo. It failed to explode, it merely made a neat hole two and one-half feet across in the side of the Henry Summers. Just at the water line. Skipper "Hi" Sooey, at the helm, exclaimed: "Bill, that cook done it!" The cook and crew were asleep forward. Skipper Sooey ordered the cook to stay on deck in every urgent manner known to maritime usage—aboard the Henry Summers. The cook and crew slept peacefully on. The East river rushed in and on through the hole. The cockpit of the Henry Summers was quickly flooded, deep, with water, and her stern began to settle. The situation was desperate, but Skipper "Hi" Sooey was the hero to face it, or—perhaps it would be better to say—to stave it down. He was made of—iron. He pulled a lantern to the mast head, reversed his business, dashed his head into the rent and inserted his substantial person snugly into the rent in the good ship Henry Summers. Then, as the Henry Summers backed swiftly down the tide, the skipper did all that he could, vocally, to make up for the lack of a steam siren in the equipment of the Henry Summers. At the foot of East Tenth street a police launch came alongside and its crew grid Skipper "Bill" from the leak. He was shivering and exhausted, but the good ship was saved. The police launch towed her safely before the cockpit was pumped out. Being much in need of brisk and warming exercise, work up the cook and crew quite thoroughly.

That Hyphen Again.

Jamie's mother tried hard never to forget what she was pleased to call her Scotch descent. Everything that Jamie wore, if possible, had a touch of plaid in it. The Highland and Scotch shorthread were the family fare. Cold, hard oatmeal porridge was served have been Jamie's fate, if his father had not objected.

Jamie was walking home from the movies with his father and mother. It was quite moonlight, with plenty of fleecy clouds in the sky.

The lassie on Jamie's little Scotch eye was fast asleep against his back because he was looking up intently at the sky.

"Mother, look!" he exclaimed. "It's a big cloud shaped like an eye!"

"There you are. This is the limit," said Jamie's father to his mother. "Your Scotch blood cut out this Scotch business. Your grandfather's birthplace was safe in the south of Ireland and there is no doubt about my grandfather's birthplace being Scotch."

"After this, son, you are an American. And that beautiful sky is a blackeyed, low Irish laddie."

War Aids Jap Woolen Industry.

The army clothing orders received in Japan from the beginning of the war have stimulated the flagging ambition to make Japan a great woolen manufacturing country. The Mainichi (Osaka), points out truly enough how the tobacco monopoly contributed to a revolution in the tobacco industry, which was formerly dominated by the British and American manufacturers to put the industry energy into the task of building up a trade which Europe's competitors will not be able to take away again after the war.—Japan Chronicle.

Little Change in Warfare.

Contemporaries have always noted the singular gravity of Napoleon. He could be expansive and even gay in his intimate circle, but he was himself young—but the most never lasted, and he was always serious in comparison with the Italian campaign which he was only twenty-six years old. Napoleon's foundry and flotsam of his gaze always struck the stranger. He made himself felt in the presence of men. He bore his friends. His art, of course, was different from that of today, for his battles were won with army corps instead of armies, as we are accustomed to hear. But his warfare is always the same. Joffre and Napoleon have the same temperament, the same of both is particularly kind and engaging, and they praise freely those who have done well.

A Clan of Wits.

He—I love you.

She—But I haven't a cent in the world.

He—Excuse me; you didn't allow me to finish. I love you not—

She—So! I only wanted to try you. I have a fortune of $50,000.

He—Yes but you interrupted me again. I love you not for your money's sake.

She—Well, I'm so glad, for that was only a joke about the $50,000.

GOOD WORD FOR THE BIRDS

Beautiful, and Useful in Their Destruction of Much Insect Life That is Harmful.

The warm weather has brought the birds again. Their chirping and singing make a morning symphony the like of which can be heard from no trained orchestra. They dot the landscape with a beauty that no artistic skill can rival. They are beautiful, useful in their destruction of harmful insect pests and all so mightily in appreciating the joy of living.

Now, then, is a good time for a renewed appeal for the lives and well-being of birds.

The best instincts of the human race are devoted to the saving of all kinds of life, and sacrifice the taking of life only when such destruction serves a purpose useful to mankind.

This cannot be urged in the case of the birds. For the most part they are non food animals. The higher intelligence and spiritualism of humanity should bring about a concerted movement for small bird protection.

SOUNDED LIKE BAD BREAK

Though Anyone Who Knows Irishmen Will Know What Pat Meant to Convey.

The talk at a dinner party having turned to the subject of inadvertently making bad breaks, Congressman Jefferson M. Levy of New York related an incident about a party named Pat.

Sometime ago Pat was taken to a hospital to be treated for an eye trouble. Eventually the bandages were removed, but it was several days before the patient could distinguish the adjoining scenery.

"How about it, now, Pat?" said the doctor coming into the room one afternoon. "Are the eyes improving any?"

"Shure, doctor, an' they are that," was the prompt response of Pat.

"That's good!" returned the doctor. "Are you better, can you see the nurse now?"

"Shure, an' I can, sir," quickly answered Pat. "Faith, an' she gets plainer and plainer every day."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

John Henry on Automobiles

SAY! did you ever have to have the soothing influence of your own rattling machine in the Big City and go romping off to a rich relation's for the Christmas week-end?

Well, don't do it. If you can help it, and if you can't help it get back home as soon as possible.

When Uncle Gilbert Hawley sent us an invitation to run up to Hawleyville for a day or two I looked at Peaches and she looked at me—both we both looked out of the window.

We knew what a wildly hilarious time word have splashing out small talk to the collection of human intelligence always to be found at Uncle Gilbert's, but what is one going to do when the richest old grind in the family waves a beckoning arm?

I'll tell you what one is going to do—one is going to take to one's Old Ironsides, beat it rapidly to a choochoo and flag into Uncle Gilbert's presence with business of being tickled to death—that's what one is going to do.

You know nature has a few immature tales laws and one is that even a rich old uncle—and, of course, he is the limit pass on and leave nephews and nieces. Lean them what? Ah! that's it! Where's that time table?

Hawleyville is about forty miles away on the P. D. & Q. and it is some burg. Uncle Gilbert wrote it all himself.

Uncle Gilbert has nearly all the town in his pocket—he owns most of it. Every time he signs a check a national bank goes out of existence. He tried to count it all once, but he sprained his wrists and had to stop.

On the train, when one goes into a bank all the government bonds get up and yell, "Hello, papa!"

When he cuts coupons it's like a sleep sharing.

He has muscles all over him like a prize fighter just from lifting mortgages.

When Peaches and I finally reached the Hawley mansion on the hill we found there a case of grain extermenant. Old and distant relations were hustling around, down the aisles singing, talking in whispers; servants with scared faces and popping eyes were peeping around the corner of the house and in the roadway in front of a sobbing automobile which Uncle Gilbert and Aunt Miranda, made up to look like two manchurian ponies for a prize exposition at the Pole.

After the formal greetings we were soon put hep to the facts in the case.

You see, John, blished Aunt Miranda, while a peck of great gross gag gies danced an accompaniment on her nose: "you see, John, I persuaded the money to a man to open a garage in Hawleyville. But automobiles never got any blowouts or punctures going through here because there isn't a nail in town to stick in one, and the mail and the man left town in an awful hurry and all your Uncle Gilbert lost the money he loaned was this car. We've been trying to make up our minds to run one ourselves but we hate one whether we want it or not.

"Fine! I'll take it and run it for a spin, Uncle Gilbert!"

"Tomorrow," he answered, never taking his eyes off the man-killer in front of him, which stood there trembling with rage.

"What car is it?" I inquired politely.

"It's a demitic," Uncle Gilbert said. "Oh, you of course reads by the Earthquake Brothers in Powderville—good one for the hills, especially coming down." I volunteered. "Know how to run it?"

"I guess so: I was always a good hand at machinery," Uncle Gilbert answered.

"Don't you think you should have a chauffeur?" Peaches suggested.

"Chauffeur! Huh!" Uncle Gilbert slapped back. "What do I want with one of those fellows sitting around eating mutton out of boxes and boxes?

"Now you know why he has so much money.

"Well be back in a little while," Aunt Miranda explained. "Just make yourselves at home, children.

Uncle Gilbert continued to eye the car for another minute, then he turned to me and said, "Want to try it, John?"

"No, Uncle Gilbert," I protested. "What would the townspeople say? You with a new motor car, afraid to run it yourself! had to send to New York for your chauffeur—huh! Where's your family pride?"

"My family pride is all right," answered Uncle Gilbert. "but there's lot of contraptions in that machine I don't seem to recognize."

"Oh, thats! all right; you've a landy jitts-with-machinery," I reminded him. "Hop in now and beat fortuit. Don't let the public think that you're afraid to show a bubble through the streets of your native town. The rubber sweater bottomed to the chin and the Dutch awning over the forehead for yours, and on your way!"

Reluctantly Uncle Gilbert and Aunt Miranda climbed into the homely wagon and I gave him his final instructions.

"Now, Uncle Gilbert," I said, "grab that wheel in front of you firmly with both hands and put one foot on the accelerator and one foot on the other foot on the throttle and let the left elbow firmly rest on the dashlier. Keep the rubber tube connecting with the autoyaht for behind—closely between the teeth and let the right elbow be in touch with the quadruplex within the reach of the left knee to press over the spark coil and the right ankle works the condenser."

Uncle Gilbert grunted. "Why don't you put my left foot under blade to work? I've noticed that it's the only part of my anatomy that hasn't got a job."

"John," whispered the nervous Aunt Miranda, "do you really think you Uncle Gilbert knows enough about the car?"

"Sure," I answered, and I was very serious about it. "Now, Uncle Gilbert, keep both eyes on the road in front of you and the rest on your knee in the wagon; start the driving wheels, re just about the name of your favorite corsair and leave the rest to fate."

With a jerk they started in the Hay Wagon.

Before they had rolled along for half a mile through the town, the machine suddenly began to breathe fast and then, all of a sudden, it choked up and stopped.

"What is avpide?" whispered Aunt Miranda, pleadingly.

"No," said Uncle Gilbert, jumping out. "I think the commodities has buckled with the trapezoid," and then with a mother wrench, he twisted under the hood to see if the trouble was stubbornness or appendicitis.

Uncle Gilbert took a dislike to a brass valve, and began to knock it with the monkey wrench, whenever the valve got mad at him and upset a pint of ancient salad oil all over his features.

When Uncle Gilbert recovered consciousness the machine was breathing again, so he jumped to the blind, pointed the bow at Boston, Mass., and beans to cut the grass

Alas! however, it seemed that the demon of unrest possessed that Cooliff Coupe, for it soon began to jump Uncle Gilbert squeezed a couple of hoarse "Toot Toots!" from the horn, where on the woman in the road threw up both hands and leaped for the gas. The man threw up both feet and leaped for the fence.

The last Aunt Miranda saw of them they were entering their modest honeymoon and neck, and the divorce court was a bet.

Then the machine began to climb a telegraph pole, and as it ran down the other side Aunt Miranda wanted to know for the tenth time if it would explode.

"How did John tell you to bandit-it?" she shouted as the Roody Cart hit its way through a stone fence and began to dance a tweatsy over a strange man's lawn.

"The only way to handle this infernal machine is to soak it in water," yelled Uncle Gilbert as they hit the small pond.

"I don't see what family pride has to do with it; there isn't a soul looking," moaned Aunt Miranda.

"Oh, I! I could only be arrested for fast riding and yet this thing stopped," wailed Uncle Gilbert as they headed for the river.

"Let me out! Let me out!" pleaded Aunt Miranda, and the machine seemed to hear her, for it certainly obliged the lady.

I found out afterwards that in order to make good with Aunt Miranda the machine jumped up in the air and

Then the Bare Buggy turned around and barked at them and with an extra high jump, it shook itself free and left them flat

Late that evening Uncle Gilbert explained that there would have been no trouble at all if he had removed a defective spark plug.

But I think if Uncle Gilbert would go to Doctor Leiter and have his parlimmy removed he'd have more fun as he breases through life.

FACE DEATH TO GET DEVIL FISH

Virginian Tells of Fight to Land Specimen for New York Museum.

FISH IS 18 FEET WIDE

In Its Struggles to Escape the Monster Nearly Wrecked a Two-Ton Launch—Lifts Craft Out of the Water.

New York.—The kina of devil fisherman arrived here the other day, says the New York Times. He is Russell I. Coles of Lincoln, Va. Down beyond they always call him "Doctor" and he is—in a manner of speaking—a physician he says he has no right to it, however, while he audited medicine in his youth, he decided that he was sick at the time lire and declined to take his degree. In private life Dr. Coles is a real tobacco dealer. But for three or four months every year he leaves his firm business goes to Florida or the coast of North Carolina, runs up to Newfoundland, elsewhere, and pursues big fish. he says them if they won't have his measures taken with them, studies them, indexes a lot of scientific data out of them, and sends the specimens to various scientific museums

Doctor Coles' New Devil Fish.

Doctor Coles was straight to New York this time by a devil fish. Speaking literally, he sent the fish on to the museum of natural history, and the authorities of the museum were so grateful not only for perfect devil fish, the first of its kind they have possessed and the biggest known, but also because the doctor of its most valuable pneumatical treasures, that they made him a life member of the institution, a rare honor.

"The devil fish is not an octopus," Fishermen or fish hunters consider those the hardest creatures in the world to kill. Though not plentiful they exist in tropical waters, and although they will not attack if molested, they become dangerous if attacked.

I used a small two-ton launch and where I landed the big fish was over one hundred miles south of Tampa, Fla. in the Gulf of Mexico," he said. "You can see devil fish as they come along, for their big fins extend above the surface. On the 6th of April I got two, after bad fights, but one was used only thirteen and the other four inches feet across, and they were not as big as I wanted

Monster Roared for Boat.

"It was not until April 11 that I found the school of devil fish that met out on the big specimen. I had engaged the boat Capt. Charlie Willey, whom I had brought from Montpelier City, N. C. and the handling of the craft was in charge of Capt. Jack McLean of Punta Gorda, Fla., one of the best known fishermen on the west coast. The devil fish had no fear of the boat. There were six of them in the school. I was the expedition, one thing being a drogue, mistaken by called 'drag,' about three feet wide as big as is used in whaling

"The only thing to do was to steer the boat after the fish and try to get them. As we neared it I launched a spade lance. The big fish rushed under the boat, breaking off the handle of the lance. I had no other weapon of the kind, so I was forced to use an ordinary whale lance.

"One blow from one of those gentle five-ton fishes has measured eighteen feet across would have wrecked our craft. There was nothing to do but keep running the boat up on the back of the fish. More than a dozen times, as it came to the surface, I would lift the boat on its broad back out of the water. Each time I got a chance I used the lance, and I drove it into the region of the brain and spinal column. Finally one was killed

"Then I had to get the other, so I ran up to the place where he returned and I drove the lance into the region of the brain and spinal column. Finally one was killed. by killed it.

"You can get some idea of the size of the creature from the fact that it took two launches two and one-half hours to tow it twelve miles to my home near Capitva inlet.

Baby Herolns Fire Victim.

Passaic, N. J.—As the result of burns suffered in trying to stamp out a bonfire which threatened her playmates, Elizabeth T. Green, four years old, the daughter of Thomas A. Green, Clifton avenue, Allendale, died in St. Mary's hospital.

Her mother had warned her against fire and when a group of children were playing around the remains of a bonfire Elizabeth tried to extinguish the flames. Sparks set fire to her dress and she was rescued only after she had been fatally burned

LEFT IN ORPHANAGE, NOW SEEKS MOTHER

Lonely Girl Makes Pathetic Appeal for Help in Finding Parents or Friends.

Philadelphia.—Weary of being alone in the world without knowing where her mother and other relatives are living, Miss Frances J. Hayes of Binghamton, N. Y., has through a letter, made a pathetic appeal for the assistance of Potter Robinson to old her in a search that she is making for her parent and friends.

The young woman, according to her communication, was placed in a local Catholic orphanage when a child and kept there until she was eleven years old, when she was indentured to a family living at Friendsville, Susquehanna county, Pennsylvania, with whom she remained until three years ago, when she decided to earn her own living. She is now nineteen years old

"Life without a mother, or at least not knowing where to find her, is monotonous of a burden," she wrote to the head of the police department.

My Mother Called Several Times.

said I searching, then you will succeed in finding her for me. There is no question but that my mother had gotten angry and her whereabouts a secret, as far as I am concerned, while she practically forced me adrift in this world.

"I was born in Philadelphia, or at least I was told so, and while a child was placed in St. Vincent's home. After I had been sent there my mother and another woman, who, I think, was my sister, was in auto called to see me several times, but the time visits suddenly ceased. My mother mysteriously wrote me giving her address as No. 42 Oxford street."

FOUR HENS TO SETTLE CASE

When They Decide "This Is Our Roost," Litigants Will Come to an End.

New York.—Under instructions from City Judge Heell, a Yonkers policeman turned loose four chickens and allowed them to see where they went to roost. Upon the result of the quest will depend the judge's decision as to the ownership of the fowl.

Mrs. Mary Kalnick of 285 Orchard street and Luigi Citrone of 290 Orchard street claim the hens. They went to court about it and Judge Heell probably needed no would need expert advice. He decided that the hens experts were the hens themselves, and ordered a test. He let permitted to show which was their home

The hens showed to see that there is no interference with justice in this case," said Judge Heell to the policeman assisting around town. "Whatever direction they take, no one can be sued because they are not responsible for the dog. We had a wagon case in which someone got the baby, and I don't let anyone interfere with the actions of these hens."

SAYS MOVIES BROKE UP HOME

First Indian Marriage at Reservation in Iowa Does Not Turn Out a Success.

Marshalltown, Iowa.—That the first Indian marriage contracted on the Iowa Sac and Fox reservation at Tama has not a success is forecast in a petition for divorce filed by Josephine Youngbear, a matron of copper hue, Tom, a buck of the same color, Iowa.

The couple were married March 14, 1914. Cruel and inhuman treatment, such as to endanger her life, is the allegation made by Josephine. John denies the charge and says he has not been cruel. Tom is a big man, he says, and he thinks he has "put up pretty with a lot of nagging."

He also alleges that his wife has become addicted to the "movie habit."

Murdered His Cousin.

Hilla, Ga.—Austin Wright, who killed his cousin, John Wright, in this county 15 years ago, has returned and surrendered himself to Sheriff Millican of this county. The Wrights were chums and in a scuffle Austin cut John in the leg, inflicting a wound from which he died in death. Austin immediately left and had never been heard from until a few days ago.

$500 for One Day's Work.

Pierre, S. D.—Fred Hanson, a "waiter" employed by Sanders along the White river to help clear that section of grey wolves, has just collected $500 for one day's work. Hanson trailed a female wolf to her den in hole and by shaking squirrels on the mouth of the hole, he enticed her out and killed her. Hanson then buried the pups.

DOG VALUABLE IN WARFARE

Intelligent Animal Brings Sorely Needed Aid to Wounded During a Lull in the Fighting.

A war correspondent speaks of a French soldier who, in writing to his family, told them of a dog he had in the pet dog of his regiment. Struck by a fragment of shell in the arm and with a sabber cut over the head, the wounded man was lying half-covered by the dead bodies of his comrades, when he felt a light touch on his forehead. It was Tom, the regiment's dog.

In spite of his pain the soldier tried to raise himself up a little. He knew that the animal was trained to carry to the camp a wounded man's cap, but he had lost his own. The dog neared and the soldier said to him: "Run quickly, Tom, go and find my comrades." Tom understood. He dashed away in the direction of his regiment, ran down the slopes, crossed the barbed wire entanglements, ran down the trenches, and finally reached the group of his master. Tom understood. He dashed away in the direction of his regiment, ran down the slopes, crossed the barbed wire entanglements, ran down the trenches, and finally reached the group of his master.

Tom goes toward the firing line as soon as the bullets begin to fly. He scratches a hole in the ground and crouches there. During the lulls in the firing he does duty with the ambulance men, and helps to save the wounded.

As the Scripture Said.

"What does the little ass will happen to the proud?" inquired a Dublin Sunday school teacher of her class.

A bright little girl promptly replied: "They'll be turned into animals."

Very much surprised, the teacher asked how she arrived at that conclusion.

"He that humbleth himself shall be exalted, but he that exalteth himself shall be a 'baste,'" quoted the wee lassie without a moment's hesitation.

Your Grocer Has Them Now

The Belgian Refugee

By Victor Radcliffe

"Astounding!" cried Robert Driggs. "Where did it come from and how did it get here?"

Mr. Driggs had reason to be amazed. He was more than astounded, unnerved. A bachelor of thirty, neatness and order in his ways, shy with women, unsocial with children, an appeal to his humanity had come home to him with a force that was absolutely a shock

To the relentless, well-organized occupant of the prettiest home in Brookton, and the loneliest, in the opinion of many a sighing matron with marriageable daughters, there had come a disturbing invasion. Into his home in a peaceful frame of mind, he had returned to find Mar' Ann, old loyal family servant, pacing the porch, a bundle done up in a shawl in her arms, which she was industriously rocking and "sh-sh-ing," to the accompaniment of an unmistakable infantile chorus.

"Why—what—?" began the dumfounded Driggs.

"Don't talk too loud, Ah," warned Mary, speaking softly. "It's a baby."

"Where—did you get it?" How—does it happen to be here?" blurted Driggs, aghast.

"It's a war baby, sir."

"A what?"

"Oh, sir," don't act so horrified," pleaded Mary. "It wasn't its fault. I after noon I came out on to the porch and there was this little bundle, a little darling lying asleep in an old blanket. The sweet cherub!" and the Spinker cook, who had been at her master so through reproaching him for his carelessness in leaving the baby out, "But you said 'war baby,'" projected Mr. Driggs.

"Yes, sir, that's right."

"And what do you mean by that?" "Why," explained Mary, "of course I was startled. I telephoned to the lady next door, the widow, you know, who has just taken the place beyond our garden wall. She came over. She said than an emigrant train with a lot of Belgian refugees had laid over. It now almost morning. Some of the emigrants had put in the time practicing around town. Mrs. Tempe Jaw's opinion, some woman among the poor unfortunate got distracted and left her little baby, as she hoped, in friendly hands."

"Why, we must find the mother," began Driggs, in a worried way.

"Too late, sir," I am thinking," interrupted Mary. "You see, the train has gone on; by this time any number of miles; and, you know, that it, in fact, sir, if you can't stand it to have this poor motherless darling around the place. I'll adopt him" she declared warm-hearted Mary steadfastly.

"And leave me?"

"I'll have to, if you won't let the baby stay."

"Umm, ahem!" and Driggs reflected. Somehow it appealed to him strongly to be mortified in the little drama. He had taken in crippled dogs—at least he was human—why not a foundling? Mary abandoned to the cold charity of the world?

"Mary," he said finally in his usual definite way, "the baby can stay. Provide for its comfort." And he started to wain into the house.

"I'll pick up, sir?" Mary hailed him, "there are some necessities I must get for the poor little girl. There some clothing and coverings needed, and infant food and the like. If you could spare me for an hour, I will run down to the stores and get what is needed."

"Suppose—suppose it gets fractious."

"It won't," insisted Mary. "See, sir, it's gone to sleep. I've given it some warm milk in a bottle. I will apologize the humor of it. He was just out of the hospital, and except that his left arm was locked into one breast of his jacket, you could never have guessed what he had suffered for king and country. As he crossed the threshold of his home his father took the pipe out of his mouth and gave him a real Yorkshire welcome.

"Well, I never," said Mr. Abbott; "there's an Jim." And "another," hurrying in from the back yard, added "Thaks lucking noean so lad, lad; but whatever mind that cuit Jamm ut a tash dat?"

Saw the Fair Face of His Widow Neighbor Looking Over the Brick Wall.

"Astounding!" cried Robert Driggs. "Why, Goodness, what shall I do?" fluttered Driggs. "Stay! Hey—hey! Oh, dear! this is a terrible crisis for a defenseless man to be in!"

He bounced his bundle to his bosom, he cooed—his vain. The cries of his tilly charge redoubled.

"Yes, poor mar," spoke a sudden voice, and looking up the abashed and embarrassed Driggs saw the fair face of his widow neighbor appear looking over the top of the brick wall. Evidently she had mounted a stool or her on the other side to command the view.

"I—I am having quite a time, I say, my, thousand pardons!"

"Why don't you lay the baby down and go get it some milk?" challenged the prettiest widow.

"I—I am afraid of breaking it."

"I shall be there to help you," responded Mrs. Denslow, blandly.

"Those tender ties are pain," suggested Driggs. "Till unfasten it."

Which he did, with an immense sigh of relief and the embarrassment passed in a rustic seat, as his visitor took charge of the baby, as they tell you, rest the bones of thousands of soldiers of national renown. From the summit of the mound practically the whole area of Waterloo's battlefield is in view.

Probably there is not in the world more striking memorial than this hill of memory rising from the rolling plain that stretches all around. Yet, to create it, one of the most important features of the battlefield was destroyed. In the building of the Lion Mound the ridge of ground which formed part of the Mont St. Jean, so important a position in the battle, was removed, and the surrounding flat country made flatter still.

You ascend the mound by a seemingly endless series of steps until you reach the platform at the summit from which the pedestal of the Lion rises. That pedestal bears the simple inscription "June 18, 1815." The Lion itself, so your guide would tell you, weighed twenty-eight tons.

Mary Monuments There.

The Lion Mound occupies a site that was about the center of the British line, a front extending from Hougoumont on the left wing to Mont St. Jean, and further back the little town of Waterloo, with its orchards and gardens near at hand. Before it stretches the flat field of Waterloo, waving with corn in the summer, deep in mud in the winter, across which two cobble tracks road run away to the south in the direction of Quatre Bras, from where Wellington's troops came to the fray before the great battle.

The whole battlefield can be covered on foot in a few hours. But for its history, it is a most impressive spot. Ditches and muddy roads intersect the fields from which, even today, the plough will turn up rusty arms and bleached bones.

But the pilgrim can never forget that he is on unusual ground. The place bristles with monuments.

You descend from the Lion Mound At its base stands a little group of houses—the farm of Mont St. Jean—the Hotel, so named from the museum of Waterloo relics attached to it. A few hundred yards to the east and you find a simple pillar to the memory of Colonel Gordon. Almost opposite, across the main road, rises the Obelisk to the memory of the Hanoverian officers of the German Legion. A little farther on, by the side of the main road, stands the historic, red-roofed, white-walled farm of La Haie Sainte, the building which protected the Allies' center in the battle, and around which some of the most desperate fighting raged.

Belle Alliance and Hougoumont

About a mile down the road you come to another of those low, white, red-roofed houses. It is now a little wayside tavern. La Belle Alliance. There is an inscription over the door that tells that Wellington and Blucher met there. But this is not correct. The historic meeting took place some two miles from here.

Belle-Alliance, however, has much claim to history. It was Napoleon's headquarters at the beginning of the battle, and by the same the German said know the battle of Waterloo.

Close at hand is quite-lovely the flower-covered mound on the whole field—and one of the most recent. It shows a wounded Imperial Eagle dying in defense of a broken standard. It bears the simple legend "Aux Braviers Commandants de la Grande Armee, 18 juin 1815." To the last of those, who fought in the Grande Armee of Napoleon, to the gallant veterans of those wonderful times the Little Corporal led through Europe, Frenchmen erected the striking monument only a few years since.

From Belle-Alliance the pilgrim's road led generally to the right along the narrow lane that runs through the ridge of Waterloo. It is difficult to trace the most historic of all its recesses. Many of the landmarks of them busted about installing the sky stranger into comfort and comfortable.

"I declare!" remarked Driggs to himself after he had retired to his home, "she's one of the pleasantest women I have ever met."

By the end of a week Driggs blessed the little cherub that had been the cause of changing the entire tenor of his lonely bachelor life. The two women made a pet of the tiny stranger and Driggs himself spent half of each evening in a warm but earnest conversation with the fair face that peered over frequently. They got well acquainted and Driggs blushed last when she was not there.

"Tea-time," said of the month there came a shock. The Belgian mother appeared to claim her little one. She had found out where the lost baby was city. She could get a sure home for the little bit of humanity.

Mary cried. Mrs. Denslow was disconsolate. Driggs tried to bribe the mother to sell him the little one.

Mary solved the problem. She had been in the habit of addressing her as bachelor and widow.

"Mr. Driggs," she said slyly, "if you and Mrs. Denslow were married and could offer the Belgian widow a genuine home, as one, why, the little one would be as good as adopted."

"A capital idea!" Driggs and Mrs. Denslow will have me if I ask her."

"Ha! ha!" declared observant Mary, and she did, and happiness reigned and satisfaction all around was the glad result.

About midnight on their wedding night, the woman says he petitions for separation, she was awakened by a strange, and almost terrifying noise. She traced the uproar to her husband's feet. Saluting the Quarter-Deck.

Every time an officer or a seaman goes from the quarterdeck he salutes it. He never by any chance forgets it. This rule is strictly observed on board, says Pearson's Weekly. The quarter-deck is that part of the deck reserved for officers, and many people think that the reason why it is so hated is out of respect for those officers. The way and whereabouts of the quarter-deck is far more interesting, origin than that, however, and one has to go back hundreds of years to find the beginning of the custom. In the old days a crucifix used to stand on the quarter-deck. In those days all the sailors were Catholics, and, of course, when they approached the crucifix they crossed themselves to show their reverence for the holy symbol. It is many a long year ago since the crucifix was taken off the quarter-deck, and the quarter-deck, which was a result of it, has been handed down to us ever since.

Investigate, Anyway.

"Mr. Speaker," said the member of the house, "I would like to know if there are committees investigating anything?" "There are none," replied speaker, with a smile that seemed to chill suppressed excitement. "I regret, continued the member with deep feeling, "the appointment of a committee to investigate why nothing is being investigated. If the expeditions are because such that there is nothing to investigate, they should be met with appropriate legislation."—Puck.

The Field of Waterloo

JUST thirteen miles from Brussels the little local train that unites to Charleroi by way of Lutte used to stop at a wayside station that hundreds of thousands of British tourists knew so well—Braine-l'Alleud. What has been happening there in the past months the "fog of war" has effectively obscured; but in those days before the war, Braine-l'Alleud was the starting point of a pilgrimage few visitors to Brussels ever missed. It was the station nearest to the Field of Waterloo, says William Bateman in the London Magazine.

From Braine-l'Alleud the pilgrim would wander by one way or another to the shrine of his pilgrimage, "Le Lion de Waterloo," the great Belgian Lion, erected within the lines gained in the great battle, standing at the apex of a pyramid of earth some two hundred feet high that dominates the whole of the flat landscape for miles around. The Lion Mound stands as a monument to the memory of all the brave men who fell on that June day. Beneath the great lion, so they tell you, rest the bones of thousands of soldiers of various nations. Near the base, the building which protected the Allies' center in the battle, and around which some of the most desperate fighting raged.

ALL LIFE IS CHANGE

NATURE'S LAW AGAINST WHICH SO MANY REBEL.

Women Especially Refuse to Be Reconciled to the Inevitable—Rose May Well Teach a Lesson to Mankind.

Beauty is something to be striven for in every relation of life. Beautiful homes, beautiful cities, beautiful people are to be desired, but human beings are living creatures and men and women should remember that the law of all living things is change. The rose, blooming in loveliness, drops, without protest, its petals when its radiant hour is past, when its mission of beauty is accomplished.

But that does not mean that the rose tree dies. It only obeys nature's law without rebellion. Women are like rose; they bloom in beauty in their youth and then, when their little day of physical charm is past, they refuse to be reconciled to a temporary autumn of life and shrink from the passing winter of death.

An Indian poet has said: "The flower dreams of the fruit, while the fruit comes the flower withers." Even so women exchange their physical beauty for the very dreams of their lives, who shall say that the lifework of a woman is no more fair than the physical price she paid to achieve it? Spring only promises, autumn's harbe are filled with fruits.

Women are only given youth, beauty, strength—mental and physical—that their lives may bear fruit, and this would stand in maturity a woman in experience and a girl in appearance? There is nothing more pathetic than the woman of middle-aged years whose life has been so devoid of experience that the ornaments of youth still appeal to them as the highest goal of pleasure.

You do not want a man grown to look like a boy! Riding within a street car the other day the writer had time to observe a young father standing upon the platform with whose little child has recently passed through a critical illness. His youthful face, unwrinkled by thought, was beautiful to view; a man's expression—a father's expression. No one would have called him a boy. With man's responsibilities his features were at taking manhood's dignity.

And, somehow, upon another occasion, the secret of an especially lined woman's life seemed to be revealed, when that woman's daughter remarked: "Mother never had any sympathy with women who tried to make themselves look younger than they are by artificial means. Mother believes in the mere spirit of life to accept life's changes as they come."—Dictimore Sun.

Since the war began Russia has given the Order of St. George to 33 women, all of whom served in the ranks either as fighters or were under fire as Red Cross nurses.

Several women prominent in official circles in Washington have organized a patriotic organization to be known as the Paul Jones association, the object of which is to preserve as a national heirloom the old colonial mansion of Paul Jones, Mt. Vernon, the great naval hero spent several years of his life.

Warfare Then and Now.

In 17 days the allies fired on Sebastopol 60,000 balls, averaging 64 pounds in weight, making a daily shower of 2,700,000 pounds of iron, of a total storm of 35,100,000 pounds, worth at the rate English pig iron selling (let alone transportation and manufacture) $315,000. If the cannon balls fired from the allied lines during the 15 days were rolled into rail bars weighing 60 pounds to the yard, the bars would extend 325 miles; or if laid as a railroad would suffice for a single track road from New York to Albany, with all the necessary turnouts. It is estimated that 4,000,000 pounds of powder was required to push the ball, at a cost of a pound this cost $703,000.—From the Spirit of the Times, 1855.

Shooting Through Aero Propellers.

The idea of machine guns on aeroplanes has been restricted because it was usually desirable to fire straight ahead and this could not be done on account of the propeller. But both Colonel the famous French Eyre and a German engineer have solved the difficulty by connecting the trigger of the gun with the engine so that the machine will fire only at the moment of an instant when the propeller blade has passed out of range.

SHOCK OF BATTLE CAUSES RARE ILLS

Dr. William Osler Describes the "Psychic Knockout."

WALKING GAIT IS CHANGED.

Soldiers Not Hit by Shells Act as if on a Tight Rope, He Says—Describes Effects of Poisonous Gases and the Incessant Gasping For Breath—Mortality is Very High.

New York.—Sir William Osler, regius professor of medicine at Oxford, gives another interesting side light on Europe as seen from the medical viewpoint. His letter is published in the Journal of the American Medical association. Types of nervous disorder seen very rarely in this country or in Europe have manifested themselves as a result of the extraordinary stress and strain of trench fighting. One of these disorders is a temporary paralysis without actual injury due to close proximity of an explosion. This is known to military surgeons as "shell shock paraplegia."

Another is the "psychic knockout," in which the victim remains in a stupurous state, with loss of memory and complete speechlessness or stammering. Recovery follows in a few days, as a rule, but extreme nervous irritability may persist for weeks.

In many cases the walking gait is changed in all sorts of curious ways. One remarkable case is described in detail by the patient himself. Here the effort at throwing the body when walking resembled a tight rope walker's efforts.

Commenting on his experience with soldiers, Professor Osler says that trench warfare is evidently a "nerve racking business," causing all sorts of troubles from simple nervous breakdown to severe functional disorders.

"In many cases tobacco is a factor. The hardened veteran may smoke from twenty to thirty cigarettes a day without inconvenience, but the unseasoned soldier cannot stand such excess. Among the contraband many cases of rapid pulse and slight anemia are, I believe, due to tobacco."

Gas poisoning is spoken of also. The high explosive shells, the hand grenades and shrapnel all do great damage, but none of them is quite so frightful as the deadly gases. Varieties of gas poisoning do not always the at once, but drag out a lingering and painful death, caused by a suffocative swelling in the lungs.

Professor Osler has seen thirty cases, of which number only three were very severe.

"The other patients," he says, "were convalescent, and nothing under could be determined on physical examination, but in several cases there was functional disability. One from had suppuration of the lymph scrotal; neither the inspiratory or expiratory murmurs could be heard distinctly. Anatomically, it is an acute bronchitis. The gas appears to be chlorine. Masks saturated with solutions of sodium hyposulphite, with glycerin to keep the material moist, appear to be an efficient protection. Certainly the gas is a great adjunct to the frightfulness of war."

TWO GREAT INVENTORS.

Their Foresight Did Not Equal Their Genius Ability.

Not infrequently great inventors do not comprehend the significance of the thing they have produced. An interesting anecdote of two famous men of science who on foresight did not equal their inventive ability appears in Les Inventions Illustrees.

When Hertz first began to obtain satisfactory results from his now famous researches into the possibility of transmitting electric waves certain men of science suggested that some day similar vibrations might serve to transmit messages through space. Hertz laughed at the hypothesis and assured listeners that his experiments were for laboratories only. Now, after a few short years, it is hard to find a single issue of a daily paper that does not record some interesting example of the use of wireless telegraphy.

Lavasseur was the great engineer who sketched the automobile with such skill that his design has not been materially changed to this day. After Levassor accomplished his historic trip from Paris to Bordeaux and return at the dizzy speed of about fifteen miles an hour his admirers gave him a banquet. During the toasts one of them, stirred by the spirit of the occasion, rose and enthusiastically called on the assembly to drink to the approaching day when carriages should travel at the speed of sixty miles an hour. Levassor turned to his nearest neighbor and asked in a quick undertone, "Why is it that after every banquet some people feel called on to make fools of themselves?"

IRON IN WATER.

It Takes Only the Least Little Bit to Make Itself Felt.

Half a part per million of iron in water is detectable by taste, and more than four or five parts makes water unpalatable. In some mineral springs iron is the constituent which imparts a medicinal value to the water, but ordinarily it is undesirable. More than 25 parts per million in water used for laundering makes a stain on the clothes. Iron must be removed from water from which ice is made or a cloudy, discolored product will result. An iron content of over two or three parts per million in water used in the manufacture of paper will stain the paper.

Iron is harmful in water used for steaming, for it is in equilibrium with acids which tackle the boiler because dissociated, with the result that the free acids corrode the boiler plates, but the amount of iron carried in solution by most waters is so small that the damage it does to steam boilers generally amounts to little.

Waters having a high iron content have in some places, where they have been used as city supplies, caused an immense amount of trouble and expense, for they favor the growth of crenothrix to such a degree that the water pipes become clogged with the iron sheaths of that organism. The removal of iron from water is sometimes easy and sometimes very difficult. United States Geological Survey.

Quite.

Little Mandie would tell "whoppers." One day her aunt thought she ought to be cured of this habit, so she spoke seriously to the little maid, who promised to mend her ways.

To point the moral auntie told the tale of the shepherd boy who "was always calling 'Wolf!' until no one could believe him. Then one day a wolf really came and ate up all the sheep.

"All the sheep?" interrupted Mandie.

"Yes, every one of them," replied auntie decidedly.

"Every single one?"

Auntie nodded.

"Well," said Mandie slowly, "I don't believe you, and you don't believe me do them."—London Answers.

Public Penance.

A quaint old law for the punishment of petty offenders exists to this day in Middleburg, the Netherlands, and anything resembling it is not known to any government. Drains in Zeepolder weeds quickly spring up in the streets followed the paving stones, and here, under the eye of a none too severe guard, the offenders are put to work with a large trowel shaped knife clearing away the surprising blades of green. Each is provided with a wooden stool; hence it may be imagined that they are not hard driven. Here men and women alike who have been convicted work in this manner.

Magazines on Warships.

If there is one danger that military dread more than any other it is magazine in the perilous magazine. To prevent such an accident is a defense for flooding that compartment in the least possible time. Hence, almost invariably, a pipe issues the surplus from which is closed by two rims, which are connected with the deck. In case of danger, all to do is to unscrew the nuts to open the pipe, let the sea rush in through the pipes and flood the magazine. The water is afterward drained off by means of a gutter.—London News.

JYSTER FARMING SUCCESSFUL

Remarkable Returns From First Practical Experiment in Louisiana.

New Orleans.—Remarkable returns have resulted from the first practical "oyster farming" experiment the Louisiana state conservation commission has undertaken in making use of the heretofore unused water bottoms of the state.

Sample shells from the bottom of Sister lake, in Terrebonne parish, have arrived at the office of the conservation commission, and, although planted nine months ago, clusters of oysters, some of them of marketable size, from eight to fourteen in number, were growing on each. Three sheds were the old so "shucked" shells that were planted on the bottom of Sister lake, or Lake Caillou, as it is sometimes called, to provide "scutch" for the young oysters or "spat."

This lake, having a water bottom of 160 acres, has the proper salinity of water for the growing of oysters, but lacked the necessary hard bottom or other solids for the oyster "spat" to attach itself and therefore prohibited any experiment in the growing of the bivalves.

Last year it was decided to sow the bottom of the lake with the old oyster shells, and on May 8, 1914, the commission distributed 10,000 barrels of old shells over the lake's bottom. Results were at once apparent, as for days it was found that "spat" from the seed oysters spread in the lake had arrived and were in all stages of development. Inspector J. Lenet worked under the direction of Frank T. Payne. The investigations showed that the oysters were growing at a rapid rate.

In March, or nine months after the "shucks" was planted, the inspector found up clusters from various parts of the lake and sent these to the commission for examination. The oysters were remarkably rich in flavor and of the finest salty taste.

BULLET HOLE IN BRAIN.

But Boy Is Expected to Be Himself Again.

Hoisington, Kans.—There is a case in the hospital in this city that is attracting the attention of physicians throughout western Kansas. Clay Brewster, fourteen years old, the son of a McPherson man, was the victim of an accidental shot from a gun three weeks ago, a small bullet striking him in the left eye and passing through the cerebrum of the brain, coming out through the top of the head.

In passing through the brain the bullet did not actually destroy any of the brain cells, but severed the nervous fibers. The bullet was removed. Young Brewster was unconscious for several days and no hopes were entertained by his physicians.

He has regained consciousness and recognizes friends and makes his wants known by signs. He cannot talk, and his right side is paralyzed. The attending physicians say that he will recover, and there will probably be no bad effects from the injury.

"Yes."

He saw her nail bravely the length of the dining-room, out into the office. What a unfortunate! Arrington was out of the question. Elsa was not a child, to be reasoned with. She was a woman, and she had come to a woman's understanding of her heart. To place before her the true angles of the case, the heartless banishment from the world she knew, the regret which would be hers later, no matter how much she loved the man.

He pushed back his chair, leaving his coffee untasted.

He pondered at the deep understanding of the kindly heart, and his one thought was Elsa's future happiness. Could he save her from the day when she would learn Romance had flown from within? No, all he could do was to help find the man.

He took five cabs across to Saigon, to the consulate, to the principal hotels—the most difficult consolation he had ever attacked. But because he had forgotten to send the slant to the hotel, he took a long chance the affability of Warrington changing his mind and not leaving his labor was known to the winds.

Meanwhile Elsa stopped at the office desk. "I left a note for Mr. Warrington who has gone to Calcon. I'am leaving her now. Will you please attorn it to me."

The clerk did not hesitate an instant. He gravely received the notes to her, marvelling at her calmness. Elsa crossed the lobby to the elevator, moved toward the stairs, wondering if she should see her mother before she broke down utterly. He had gone. He had gone without knowing that all he wanted in life was his for the taking. In her room she opened the note and through blurred vision read what she had so happily inscribed the night before "Paul—I love you. Come to me. Elsa." She had written it unashamed.

She flung herself upon the bed, and there Martha found her.

"Child, child, what is it?" Martha cried, kneeling beside the bed. "Child, what has happened?"

Elsa sat up, seized Martha by the shoulders and stared into the faithful eyes. "Well, I love him, the man Warrington and he loves me. But he has gone. Can you see? Don't you understand? Have you been as blind as I? He is Paul Warrington's adopted brother, his twin brother. And they obliterated him. It is Arthur who is the ghost, Martha. I know it now. I have caused you a good deal of worry, and I am going to cause you yet more. I am going to Saigon; up and down the world east and west, until I find him. Shall I go alone, or will you go with me?"

Then Martha did what ever after endeared her to the heart of the stricken girl—she mothered her. "Elsa, my baby! Of course I shall go with you always. For you could not live any more if he was not worthy."

Then followed the strangest quest fugitives ever made by a woman. From Singapore to Saigon, up to Bangkok down to Singapore again; to Batavia, over to Hongkong, Shanghai, Peking, Manila, Hongkong again, then Yokohama. Patient and hopeful Elsa followed the bewildering trail the left behind her many puzzled hotel managers and booking agents; for it was not usual for a beautiful young woman to go around the world, inquiring for a blond man with a parrot. Sometimes she was one day or a day late. Many cablegrams she sent, but upon her arrival it was her patient part she found that had not been called for after these cablegrams. Her bewildered expostulations she uttered no complaint. The world was big and wide; he is never on his mind, Elsa knew that some day she would find him.

In the daytime her mind was the quest; but, ah! the nights, the interminable hours of inaction, the spaces of time in which she could only lie back and think. Up and down the coasts, across islands, over seas, the journey took her, until one day in July she found herself upon the tiled verands of the house in which her mother had been born.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Two Brothers.

From port to port, sometimes not stopping off the boat at all, mostly restless and irritable, Warrington sended his way home. There was nothing surprising in the fact that he never inquired for mail. Who was there to write? Besides, he sought only the obscure hotels, where he was not likely to meet any of his erstwhile fellow passengers. The moods and carelessness of his home going became more and more apparent as the days dragged by. Often he hoped to fly back to the Jungles, to Jamok and many matters as they were. Here and there along the way he had tried a bit of luxury, but the years of economy and frugality had robbed him of the ability to enjoy it. He was going home to what? Surely there would be no welcome for him at his journey's end. He would return after the manner of prodigals in general, and scrounge a living, which he was not wanted. Of his own free will he had gone out of their lives.

He fought, fought against the thought of Elsa; but he was not strong enough to vanquish the long ings from his heart and mind. Always when some one was in tears with him, now smiling sinuously into his face, now peering down at the phosphorescent spots swirling alongside, now frowning with her chin uplifted, her eyes half shut, letting the storm winds strike her full in the face. Many a "good-night" had sent him to his bed. An instant, that could be all.

"Yes, I have often wondered where you were, what you were doing. You and your brother were upper-classmen. I never knew Arthur very well; but you and I were chummy, after a fashion. Arthur was a little too bookish for my style. Didn't we use to call you Old Galahad? You were always walloping the bullies and taking the weaker chaps under your wing. To me you were the last man in the world for this business. Moreover, I never could understand, nor could Arthur, how you got it, for you were not an office man. Women and cards, I suppose. Father said that you had the making of a great engineer. Fleeces time, this old town," waving his hand toward the myriad sparkling roofs and towers and spires. "Have to be strong and hard-headed to survive it. Built anything since you've been away?"

"In Canada." To have thrown away a decade!

"Glad you kept your hand in. I dare say you've seen a lot of life." To the young man it was an extremely awkward interview.

"Yes; I've seen life," dully.

"Grand, mostly, I suppose. Your letter about the strike in oil was mighty interesting. Heap of money over there, if they'd only let us smart chaps in to dig it up. Now, old man, I think you to wipe the slate clear of these ten years. We'll call it a bad dream. What are your plans for the future?"

"Plans!" Warrington looked up blankly. He realized that he had made no plans for the future.

"What do you intend to do? A man like you wasn't made for idleness. Look here, Paul; I'm not going to beat about the bush. We've got a big contract from the Chilean government, and we need a man to take charge, a man who knows and understands the scrambling of the yellow people. How about a salary of ten thousand a year for two years, to begin in October?"

Warrington twirled the check. Work, rehabilitation.

"Could you trust me?" he asked quietly.

"With anything I have in the world, anything and, Paul, there's no philanthropic sitting to this offer. You've pulled through a devil of a hole. You've plenty of. I should not be holding down this chair if I couldn't tell a man at a glance. We were together two months in Peru. I'm familiar with your work. If you want to know whose portrait that is up there? Well, it's General Chetwood's, the founder of this company, the silent partner. The man who knew kings and potentates and rajahs, who laid the wooden bridges in their back yards. This building belongs to his daughter. She conceived her stock into granite. About a month ago I received a letter from her. It directly concerned you. It seems she learned through the consul at Singapore that you had been working with us. She's like her father, a mighty keen judge of human nature. Frankly, this offer comes through her advices. To satisfy yourself, you have given us a survey bond for fifty thousand. It's not obligatory, mind you."

His Chetwood. She had her fa-, their eyes, and it was the white hand drawn his gaze to the portrait. Chetwood; and Arthur had not known anything about Jim Sold. What topic? Ten years wrecked for nothing! His first day in New York left him with nothing more than a seeding of foreboding and oppression. The expected exhilaration of returning to the city of his birth did not materialize. He used to open spaces was he, to disclose and the circle of humanity that he knew he no longer belonged to the city with its Himalayan gorges and of enjoyment, whose torrents were human beings and whose glaciers were the hearts of these. A great loneliness bore down on him. For months he had been drawing familiar pleasure, and to find none of these was like coming home to an empty house. The old life was indeed over; there were no threads to resume. A hotel stood where his club had been; the house in which he had spent his youth was no more. He wanted to leave the city and the desire was with difficulty overcome.

Early the second morning he started downtown to the offices of the Andes Construction company. He was in the (unusually nervous Cold sweat continually moistening his palms. Change, change, everywhere change. Trinity was like an old friend. When the tall city driver fetched off the power and indicated with a jerk of his head a couple of brick four-story houses in blue, Warrington asked: "What place is that?"

"The Andes building, sir. The construction company occupies the top floor."

"Very good," replied Warrington, sighing and handing up a fare.

From a relignary of the Dutch, an office of red brick four-story affair, this monolith had sprung. With a sigh Warrington entered the cavernous doorway and stepped into an "express elevator." When the car arrived at the top floor he was surprised to find he was alone. He passed before the door of the vice-president. He recalled the "old man," thin lipped, blue-eyed, expressive. It was all very strange, this request to make the restitution in person. Well he would soon learn why. He drew the certified check from his wallet and scrutinized it carefully. Twelve thousand, eight hundred dollars. He replaced it, opened the door, and walked in. A boy met him at the railing and stepped into an express car. "Vice-president, sir."

"I have an appointment with Mr. Elmore. Tell him that Mr. Ellison is here."

The boy returned promptly and signified that Mr. Elmore was at liberty. Well, was not the "old man" always looked up from a busy man's desk. It was the "old man" he had to face. Warrington had seen since his arrival. There was no hind shaking: there was nothing in evidence on either side to invite it.

"Ah! Sit down, Paul. Let no one disturb me for an hour," the young vice-president advised the boy. "And close the door as you go out."

Warrington sat down; the bridge of a pince-nez slipped his hand and stared at his visitor, not insolently, but with kindly curiosity.

"You've filled out," was all he said.

After fully satisfying his eyes, he asked: "I dare say you are expected to find father. He's been gone six years. Intimating one of the two portraits over his desk.

"It was not at the 'old man' Warrington looked longest. "Who is the other? he asked.

"What? You worked four years with this company and don't recollect that portrait?"

"Frankly, I never noticed it before." Warrington placed the certified check on the desk. "With interest," he said.

The vice-president cracked it, ran his fingers over his smooth chin, fondled the check and extended it across the mahogany sanctum.

"We don't want that, Paul. What we wanted was to get you back. There was no other way. Your brother made up the loss the day after you went away. There was no scandal. Only a few of us in the office knew. Never a word to the outside world. It was impossible for Warrington to digest an accounting involving a million. His mind could only repeat the phrases: 'No scandal; only a few of us in the office knew; never got to the newspapers. For ten years he had hidden himself in wilderness, avoided hotels, read no American newspapers, never called for mail. Oh, monstrous fool!

"And I could have come home at noon—once!" he said, leaning back, lifting the crumpled check in his hand rather than the man in the swivel chair.

A Man Like You Wasn't Made for

"Yes. I have often wondered where you were, what you were doing. You and your brother were upper-classmen. I never knew Arthur very well; but you and I were chummy, after a fashion. Appropriate Gowns for the Evening

There are evening gowns and evening gowns. Some of them are naively simple, some taffeta that shimmers in light colors, or of vapory lace over crepe or chiffon. Lace either by quite as charming are those of taffeta veiled with lace or net, and plaited up a side or one part of the whole number. Their contemplation entices one to follow the line until those splendid ones are found in white lace and tulle or crepe de chine. The simmer of satin and the sparkle of paillettes are called upon with every object entirely in material and decoration to achieve the distinction that is required.

Always among any collection there are examples of black in which tulle or lace is brightened with jet. Sometimes it is black over white, or a color, but more often it is all black, as in the gown of tulle shown in the picture. In this model there is no end to the fullness of the skirt, with its scattered jewelled plaiting of tulle extending half way up at the front, back and sides and about the bottom.

There is an under petticoat of satin messaline and a small bodice which is cut given on a survey bond for fifty thousand. It's not obligatory, mind you."

New Bodices Made of Lace Flouncing

There is no telling where the usefulness of the ever-present silken bodice will end. Besides its prime importance in gowns and blouses they have been exploited in the realm of millinery and by those who make all the dainty little things for boudoir wear and the undermoulles of today.

These laces are not imitation of handmade designs, but something quite apart. They seem to be so with their designers are adapting patterns to the weaving of cotton laces to the machinery. The precision and efficiency of machinery are factors to be considered, and they enable the designers to achieve the utmost fabrics ever woven, in patterns incredibly intricate and fascinating.

In the good old days of yore only sisters and aunts or others of princely fortune could wear laces, but now everyone may own these beautiful stuffs, because the price is so moderate.

A pretty bodice and a dainty blouse are shown in the picture. Lace flouncing is used for the bolero, which is to be worn over a corset cover of lace or one of this wash silk. The lace is fulled across the front into the shoulder straps and these and all other seams are finished with feather stitching done in heavy embroidery silk. The sleeves are fitted to the elbow, also the collar and sleeves, and is set in a deep ruffle of lace. The blouse is stayed with fine wire supports to stand up—more or less—at the back of the neck.

All silver pattern is used for the dainty blouse at the right of the picture, although flouncings are woven in silver pattern and the silver is generally included, which will serve the same purpose. This simple blouse is cut so forming cuffs and collar makes an effective trimming.

These sweaters are usually longer than the ordinary garment, reaching half-way between waist and knees and with a tasseled belt, giving quite the effect of a Russian blouse. White and dark furs were used for the sweaters.

Another way of finishing the crepe de chine garments is to add crocheted collar, front band, belt at the bottom and pockets. This is about what makes an alluring finish to a startling costume.

COME TO RESCUE OF BRUIN

Threatened With Extinction, Brother Bear Has Friends Now in Some Friends.

Since the "bear flag" days bruin has become a well-established resident native of the Golden state. He occupies a place on its great seal, and, indeed, has become a part of its history. When he is not working at his more dignified job he engages in picking up scores, acting as scavenger around municipal camps and holds an occasional raid upon farms in the hills. He has come to be known, in private life, as a rather amiable and lazy fellow. If undisturbed, and indeed it may be claimed for him that he has a sense of friends.

Yet bruin, in the wild, has come close to the great divide. For many years no bear made sport for the hunter during the winter, and he slept through all seasons. Nowadays there are not very many of him, comparatively speaking. He is about to go the way of another distinguished brute.

A Bishopic county legislator has rushed to his relief with a bill prohibiting the killing of bears between the summer and eliminating at all seasons the bear hunt. Bruin is a big measure, it is said, in finding its way into numerous western legislature, and is being supported by a powerful coterie of sportsmen. It is their hope that bruin will be able to maintain his place in the sun.—Los Angeles Express.

Fixing the Crime.

It was said a good deal in the trial of "alias-some" at the hydro, but just because it was free speculation it was high, and the critics were in full force. "The young man who rose to say 'The Nobody's made of Brass' had the best intentions in the world, but someone he was not up to what is called 'convert pitch.' Indeed, he was very much better off and after making two or three attempts he had to quite the matter—and he was sent to the bench. They the benevolent-looking chairman rose.

"Ladies and gentlemen, there is not a word to be said against the young gentleman. He did his best, and what can man do more? He deserves our thanks for his willingness to do so. We can only add—adding thanks that the person who asked him to sing 'Rule Britannia' was not a Scotsman."

New Field for Woman.

The opening of new avenues of profitable endeavor for women is a matter of considerable importance. As Manuel Mizor company of New York is making an effort to utilize them as mechanics in a central communication the president of the company says: "I believe there is room for women in the automobile business. Women have proved to be good salesmen and demonstrators in other lines. We believe that they will be particularly successful with automobiles, and we are going to take the trouble to find out whether we are right or wrong."

The company has accordingly put Margaret Eastman, based it in charge of the salewoman's bureau and has reports that the women so employed are proving their value.

BOUNTIFUL PROMISE FROM WESTERN CANADA

Average Increase of Acreage in Wheat Over 22 Per Cent.

Province	Wheat Acreage Increase
Saskatchewan	22½ per cent
Alberta	22½ per cent
Manitoba	15 per cent
Average for province	22½ per cent

Saskatchewan.

The growth of the crop during the past week was very satisfactory. Rain fell in many places during the early part of the week, followed by warmer weather, which has been most beneficial to the grain. Breaking and summer-fallowing were well under way, and conditions generally were most promising.

The following reports have been received by the department from the various centres: Denfield—A little rain needed in the northern part to start late grain; remainder of district plenty of moisture. Davidson—Ideal growing weather, a few farmers having grain to conserve moisture by breaking crust formed since last rain. North Battleford to Prince Albert—Good growing weather; crops looking well. Hilger—Some rain; crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Hanley—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Lanigan—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Lipton—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Moosomin—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Qu'Appelle—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Regina—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Rosthern—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Saskatoon—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Tisdale—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain. Yorkton—Crops looking fine and prospects good; plenty of moisture, with prospects of more rain.

Alberta.

"Prospects excellent. Abundant moisture throughout the province, following rains. Area thirty to thirty-five per cent greater. Crop generally two weeks earlier."

Attention is drawn to the fact that the land has not been fallowed to the condition to work for years; neither has the land been summer-fallowed as there was last autumn. This was protected during the winter by little more than the ordinary snowfall, which remained on the land, not being removed by the gales. Thus moisture is in evidence. There never has been a more complete feeling that crops today, judging by the information received from various parts of the country, justified in saying that the crop never went to under more favorable circumstances, weather specially and land particularly well worked.

While it is true that the acreage will be greatly increased, it is pleasing to learn that, despite the high price of food, the recipes of milk and cream at the dairies continue to keep up, and that the output of the creameries has increased in quality.

One of the most encouraging things in last year's work was the increase of practically thirty per cent in the output of cream and butter south of Calgary.

Manitoba.

Owing to the exceptionally early harvest last year and favorable fall weather, a much larger acreage of land was prepared then usual, and partly for the same reason and the prospects of high prices for all kinds of grain, farmers took more pains in the preparation of land, so that the spring opened up with 1,235,000 acres of fully prepared land above the previous year. Seeding was general by the 20th of April, some days in advance of the average. Since that time the weather has been exceptionally favorable for the sowing of wheat, and the farmers have taken full advantage of it. Much of the crop is now above the surface. There has been a very general and liberal rainfall; this will hasten the germination of the recently sown wheat, and will prevent the not remote possibility of the late sown crop. The area sown in wheat is fully 15 per cent greater than last year.

To sum up the agricultural situation generally, the conditions of agriculture says: "The area is larger; than usual, the land has been well prepared, and the wheat has been sown at the right time; not so early as to run the risk of being killed off by frost, but sufficiently early to insure its ripening in the fall."—Advertisement.

Evidence.

"I have reason to believe that picture is a genuine Rembrandt."

"Have you had it examined by an expert?"

"No, but I picked it up in a second-hand store for a dollar and a half and it looks like a genuine Rembrandt as acquired."

The KITCHEN CABINET

Pride is one of the seven deadly sins, but it cannot be the pride of a mother to be children, for that is one of the of two—cardinal virtues—faith and hope.—Ibsen.

This is the season when we read of families with "mushroom appetites and fondatious! Judgment, he saw the little green fungus, the unedible mushroom as a foodstuff, but there is so much distinction. Mushrooms are edible and poisonous; those which are not edible are also much the best. Mushroom tests, blackening of a silver spoon, and similar tests are absolutely unreliable. The only way to be sure of the kind of mushroom is to know the fungus. Now is the time to make all the above things for boudoir wear and the undermoulles of today.

SEASONABLE DISHES.

A pretty custard to serve as a company dish is prepared thus: Use three eggs to a pint of rich milk, reserving one white from the five. Line the bottom of each custard cup drop a small bit of jelly, pour in the custard and when baking garnish the top with the white of egg and color with some of the jelly.

Coffee Junket.—To a pint and a half of milk add a cupful of very strong coffee, sweetened to taste and add a junket tablet, dissolved in a teaspoonful of hot water. Pour into sherbet cups and serve with whipped cream when the junket is firm.

Veal Loaf.—Roll a pound of lean veal in water to cover. Wash, dose, take out the meat and simmer the stock until reduced to a half cupful. Add this, with salt, celery salt, grated peel of a lemon and juice of half, to the chopped veal in a teaspoonful of hot water. Mold and place a weight on the dish. The next day it may be turned out and sliced. Garnish with lemon and parsley.

Pineapple Filling for Cake.—To one (1 grated pineapple add a half cupful of flour, mixed with a little water, a cupful of sugar, the juice of two lemons, sugar, cook until smooth and add a cup of chopped nuts and raisins. This may be made the day before using.

Salmon Salad.—To a can of salmon add one cupful of cucumber pickles, one and a half cupfuls of celery and nuts, crushed fine, mix well and moisten with salad dressing. The pickles should be chopped.

Prune Filling.—Take thirty prunes, a half cupful of chopped nuts, the whites of four eggs, four tablespoonfuls of sugar. Stew the prunes until very thick, add a half cupful of walnuts, add sugar and fold in the beaten whites. Bake in a buttered pan set in hot water. Serve with cream.

Strawberry Shortcake.—To a quart of flour add two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, a half teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of butter and milk. Cut in three tablespoonfuls of shortening and add milk to make a soft dough. Bake in two layers with butter between, then the cake can be easily split; add butter were hot and cover with crushed berries. Serve with whipped cream.

COOKING MUSHROOMS.

This delicious vegetable which may be had in many localities just for the seeking, is so inviting of a treatment well prepared that it should be studied so that the common varieties may be gathered without danger of getting the poisonous varieties. The cap of the mushrooms should be peeled and then thrown them into cold water, so that if there are any insects the water will draw them out. Then drain and wipe dry; put into saucepan with butter and stew them well covered so that the flavor will not be lost.

Broiled Mushrooms.—Select large even-sized mushrooms, peel the caps, remove the stems and place them upside up on a broiler, put a bit of butter in each cap and place over the heat. Cook slowly for a few minutes with salt and pepper; serve hot.

COOKING MUSHROOMS.

This delicious vegetable which may be had in many localities just for the seeking, is so inviting of a treatment well prepared that it should be studied so that the common varieties may be gathered without danger of getting the poisonous varieties. Then drain and wipe dry; put into saucepan with butter and stew them well covered so that the flavor will not be lost.

THE SANDMAN STORY

By Mrs. F. A. WALKER

STORY OF HALF RAVEN.

A witch who had two daughters lived in a cave in the forest. One daughter was good and the other was bad, for she was like her mother, who was a bad witch.

The good daughter had a pet raven, of which she was very fond, and one day the bad girl said to her: "Give me half of your raven and I will feed it half the time."

The good daughter, not suspecting the bad girl's motive, said: "We will own it together." But one day the bad girl said: "I want my half of the raven to give to the cat." The good girl cried and begged her not to do such a wicked thing. "I will give you my half," she said, "if you will let the raven live."

But the bad girl said "No," and cut the raven in half and gave her half to the cat, who ate it and disappeared behind the other half, when, to her surprise, it jumped up and hopped about on one leg and flapped its wing.

"Do not weep, mistress, I'm safe," I will punish your sister for taking away my other half." And speeding his wing, Half Raven flew away.

After a while he met an eagle. "Give me one of your feathers," he said to the eagle. The eagle gave it, and Half Raven flew away with the feather tucked under his wing. He met a little feather and met a fox. "Give me a little feather," said the fox.

The fox gave it to him, and Half Raven flew on and met a little rock closed, and they never were seen again.

As soon as the witch and the bad girl began running the good girl hurried to the pot, which had cooled, but boiling to be able to save Half Raven.

Just as she reached the pot Half Raven popped to the top and perched on the handle. There he stood just as he was before the bad sister took his life. The good girl was very glad and stood first on one leg and then on the other.

"You see, I am whole," he said. "Now, stir the pot." And as the good sister stirred bright gold bits rolled and bubble to the top and fell in the pot. Half Raven hopped off the handle and the good girl lived in peace and plenty ever after.

On the Safe Side.

"I am sorry to see that you can keep your temper, Edgar," asked the minister. "I'm going to be a soldier," he cried the six-year-old.

"But soldiers are often killed by the enemy," said the good man.

"Then," said Edgar promptly, "I guess I'll be an enemy."

Should Always Be Done.

What is that which you can keep after giving it to someone else? Your word.

GOOD USE FOR VACANT LOTS

Chicago Health Department Would Permit Children to Play on Unused Land—Favors Gardens.

"Vacant" is a misnomer for most unused city lots. They may not have dwellings on them, and in that sense they may be vacant, but in many such cases they are strewn with unsightly, unhealthy litter. Instead of that, they ought to contain that which is healthful—sightly things, objects that by their very presence tend to create good citizenship. The Chicago health department evidently had all this in mind when it circulated these "vacant lot rules:

"Love your neighbor's lot as you do your own—but be sure to love your own.

"Don't plant tomato cans or rubbish on unused lots; their roots are withered civic pride.

"Don't allow tumble-down buildings to stand on val

TURKS FALL BY THE THOUSANDS

Sir Ian Hamilton Reports Terrific Slaughter.

MADE UNCEASING ATTACKS.

Hot Fire of Allied Artillery Shatters Foe's Ranks—Sir Ian Hamilton Officially Fixes Enemy's Losses in Four Days at 5,000 Killed and 15,000 Wounded.

London—More than 5,000 Turks were killed and 15,000 wounded in Dardanelles operations from June 28 to July 3, according to an estimate made by General Sir Ian Hamilton, commander of the British forces, in a report made public by the official press bureau. The report says:

"About 2 a. m. (date not given) the searchlights of the destroyer Scorpion discovered half a thousand Turks advancing near the sea, to the northwest of Krithia. The Scorpion opened fire and few of them got away.

"Simultaneously the enemy attacked a fresh section of our trenches, due west of Krithia, advancing from a ravine in close formation with the usual bugle attack came under artillery and enfilading rifle fire, the enemy losing heavily. The formation Turks got with in forty yards of the parapet, but only a few returned.

"The Turks made several heavy bomb attacks during the night, one whose being twice driven back, a short distance. Early in the morning we repulsed three bombings by bayonet attack. They have since been strengthened. At 5:30 a. m. 2,000 Turks, moving from Krithia into a ravine, were scattered by machine gun fire.

"The operations reflect great credit on the vigilance and accurate shooting of the Scorpion. The Turkish losses in the nullah and ravine are estimated at from 1,500 to 2,000.

"About noon p. m. on June 30 the Turks again attacked with bombs a portion of the most northerly trench captured by us on the 28th. An assault of Cypriots being repulsed (not dangerously, as it turned out), the men became infuriated, flung all their bombs at the enemy and then, charging down out of the trench, used their bayonets for the first time and with excellent effect.

"About dawn the Turks once more attempted to attack over the open, but nearly the whole of these attacking forces, about half a battalion, were shot down, and a final bomb attack, though commenced, failed utterly.

"Prisoners brought in state that three fresh battalions were employed in the main attack, which was made by personal order of Enver Pasha, the Turkish war minister, who, as they definitely assert, was present in the trenches on June 29. This is confirmed by the evidence of an interpreter Armenian prisoner captured on that date. According to him, stringent orders were recently issued that no further attacks were to be made, because if the Turks remained on the defensive the British would be forced to attack and would suffer severely, as the Turks bitterly had suffered, but Enver Pasha when he arrived in the northern section overrode the instructions, and orders were received by the officers of regiments that the Australians were to be driven into the sea.

"On July 2, after a heavy bombardment of our advanced positions by high explosives and shrapnel, lasting half an hour, the enemy in thirty advances, but were driven back by the main nullah, about a mile from our front by the accurate shooting of the Scorpion.

"The Turkish officers could be seen endeavoring to get their men forward, but they would not face the fire and retreated in disorder after suffering heavy casualties. The ground in front of our trenches in every direction can be seen covered with Turkish dead. Bureau said on at slight report that the valleys and ravines are also full of them.

"After checking and counterchecking the reports from all sources I put down their total casualties between June 28 and July 3 at 5,000 killed and 15,000 wounded."

BELGIAN FARMERS COMING.

Farms Have Been Stocked For the Colony Near Wilmington, N. C.

Rotterdam, a small party of Belgian farmers whose farms have been laid waste will leave Flushing shortly for New York en route to farms near Wilmington, N. C. The farms have been stocked for them, farming utensils furnished. Steamship and railway fares are co-operating by reducing fares, so that the whole journey may be accomplished for as little as $25 per head.

The colony will be known as Little Belgium. The project has been approved by the American secretary of agriculture.

Northern Michigan

J. B. Dean, of Boyne City, has been appointed county truant officer by May L. Stewart, the recently elected county school commissioner. Wm. F. Dashaw, of East Jordan, had formerly held this office under Commissioner Milford.

It is estimated that the farmers and buyers in the vicinity of Traverse City still have on hand fifty carloads of potatoes which they are unable to dispose of at any price. One buyer offered a Chicago firm four carloads if it would pay the freight but the offer was refused.

Petoskey News: Mrs. Daniel Bush, who has resided with her husband on the Struthers farm near Susan lake for a number of years, was brought to Petoskey hospital Friday night and underwent a very critical operation in which about eight inches of her bowel was removed because of a cancerous growth. Mrs. Bush was in a serious condition and her chances for recovery are not considered bright.

Boyne Citizen: The funeral services of C. C. Batchelder will be held from the home of his daughter, Mrs. Hugh Deans, S. East street, this afternoon, Rev. Duffey officiating. Mr. Batchelder passed away Wednesday afternoon following several months' illness, the past two months he having been confined to his bed. Heart failure was the trouble. Mr. Batchelder, who was nearing the 69th milestone, was one of the oldest residents of this city having come here some thirty-odd years ago.

Petoskey News: Evidently the suggestions of the Petoskey Evening News are to bear fruit for there is talk among the business men of the city who are vitally interested in the summer tourists, of organizing a golf club and purchasing and securing from the city, ground for a fine eighteen hole golf course. Just where the golf links will be located is not yet known, but they will be somewhere about the city close in. There is also talk of a real sure enough summer hotel of unusual class, one where quality will be the main point and where the most wealthy people of the land will want to stay.

Traverse City Record: Crescent, North Manitou island, for the past several years a thriving little lumbering town, has been erased from the map. The A. J. White & Son saw mill is now rapidly being torn down by the company's dock and will be stored in a building erected for the purpose on the site of the old South Side Lumber company for the summer. In the fall the machinery and equipment will be taken south, possibly to Virginia. The mill was the only industry on the island, with the removal the population left the place, with the exception of one family. Mr. and Mrs. Peter Swanson, who have made their home there for the past thirty years. The Smith & Hull company are today bringing over their railroad, the Crescent & Southeastern. The steamer N. J. Nessen of the J. O. Nessen Lumber company, of Chicago, has been carrying the machinery, office furniture, etc., and will bring over the locomotives and rails of the railroad. The postoffice has been discontinued by the government.

DEVELOPMENT WORK

Special Effort is Being Made by Bureau to Get Collection of Photographs.

John I. Gibson, secretary of the Western Michigan Development bureau, is in the city today, says the Traverse City Record, which is synonomous with saying that things are stirring in the local office.

Mr. Gibson has been out on long photographing trips with the local photographer, Frank P. Wright, of Traverse City. They have been through Wexford county and part of Otsego and are accumulating a fine collection of pictures that tell a story. Each of the twenty counties in the association is to be visited and the complete collection will contain more than 2,000 photographs. These will be arranged in cabinets and indexed. There will be several sets of them, one to be arranged by counties and others according to the products of the entire twenty counties, showing grains, fruits, orchards, grasses, livestock, work in reforestration, etc. In this way immediate access is given to a complete set for any locality or for any particular form of activity.

The collection will be a representative one and will not have to be recorded for a number of years, a few additions annually keeping it down to the minute. The photos are all being taken with a definite aim in view and often fifteen or twenty miles are covered without stopping to press the the button, although many beautiful views are passed by. During the trip Mr. Gibson has also made selections of grains on the stalk to be used in the exhibitions next fall and winter.

The value of the bureau's work is being more and more appreciated by the counties that are included, as is also the worth of proper descriptive matter and illustrations in the annual magazine. The Board of Commerce of Ludington, for instance, has taken note of returns derived from the magazine and is backing a move to get Mason county people more alive to the fact and induce them to make greater efforts than they have in the past.

Preparing for Far-Reaching Publicity Camps go.

The Bureau has engaged Mr. Frank P. Wright, photographer, of Traverse City, to go over all of the twenty Western Michigan counties and make pictures of farm homes, general farm crops, orchards, good roads, resorts, industries, etc.

These photographs will be used to tell the story of the agricultural and industrial resources of Western Michigan, through the medium of Publicity Bulletins, articles in newspapers, magazines, etc. From some of the pictures a complete new set of county and association slides will be made, to be used in the fall and winter lecture campaigns to adjacent states, while other pictures will be reserved to illustrate the 1916 edition of the "Western Michigan" Magazine.

Mr. Wright has already covered Kent and Ottawa counties. He is ready to assist the photographer so that your county may be properly represented.

FLAGS.

Where high green meadows lie
By crystal brooked pools
Where cattle browse and solemnly are
The children pass to school.

Where tall trees rather on the air,
Sweet scented breath of June—
Redressed in colors peaceful fair
Swayed diplomatic as a tune.

The Blue Fire lilts its dewy face,
Soft petals tinted with white,
Pitched pathway to the heart of grace,
Invoke man to man. Johnny Bull.

Hiding by steps from cows and cities,
Our wanted thought may trace,
By slow degrees—out of time
To pomp and pride of place.

This low-born flower, through patient years,
Those first green spears, we see;
The perfect flower of the years
The royal Fleur-de-Lis.

Our Flag! Far flung, the field of blue
Pale pennon, all dotted,
Red striped, mentioning me and you,
Fraternities bind and shed.

That they and we, from servile place,
Lowly, as the fair flower,
By right to be and for God's grace
Stand Free! A worth-while power!

JEAN S. MCDONALD.

Miss McDonald, the Scotch-Irish humorist, of London, Ontario, made a number of tours in Illinois last year for the Lincoln Chautauqua circuit. She was so successful in her humor, which has been termed "the ministry of fun," that the management asked her return this year. She will appear on the fourth day, afternoon and night, with Illinois Chautauqua Band and Senator William E. Mason.

Speaking of her preparation for this work she one time said: "Yes, I graduated from a Conservatory of Music and School of Expression in London, and the rest of what I do is just natural."

Sometimes she gives Irish impersonations, at other times she impersonates colored people, again she does child impersonations. People who delight in humor should hear Miss McDonald, without fail, as she alternates with the band and the noted Illinois Senator.

THE PIKE TOUR

Annual Cruise Brings Round Dozen Automobiles Bearing Large Number Prominent Good Roads Boosters

The "hikers" have come and gone, leaving a trail of dust and a healthy boost for good roads. The outfit is about a dozen cars arrived on time at Charlevoix Friday. They were met near Norwood by a large number of local cars, and escorted into town, halting at the Green Inn, where they rested an hour, affording the visitors opportunity to air the good roads question, and it was very properly and enthusiastically aired.

Secretary John I. Gibson was master of ceremonies, introducing the speakers, some of them distinguished not only in the good roads movement, but in State and National affairs. Wm. H. Lyons, president of the West Michigan Pike Association, gave very much encouragement as to the future.

B. P. Boken, representing the Federal good roads department, made a very pleasant talk on the importance and extent of the movement. He was followed by Grover Cunningham, Democrat, whose speech was a big boost for good roads and a rousing description of the natural beauties and agricultural progress of Northern Michigan. Congressman McLaughlin of the 9th district, made a speech that was a veritable "booster" for Northern Michigan.

In the party were many distinguished business men of Western Michigan and their ladies. Among them were president, Day, of the development bureau; Mr. Hamilton, of Traverse City, one of the pioneers of the good roads movement, and who has probably spent more time and money in the work than any other Northern Michigan booster.

At noon the procession moved to Petoskey, from whence they came to Charlevoix. We are glad along back Friday and Saturday, some of the party returning here Friday night. On the entire trip from South Haven no accidents occurred, and no difficulties experienced.

STEAMER STRANDED

The steamer Arizona, of the Gov. rich line, on the Chicago and Soo run, ran aground at 5-mile point, near Middle Village, in the fog, Saturday morning. She had just left St. James.

The steamer had 70 passengers, which were taken off by the steamer Columbia and landed in Harbor Springs. The Arizona was released Saturday night, by wrecking tugs. Her bottom was badly damaged.

The ship was headed for Harbor Springs and was of her course about a mile to the north. She was towed by the tug Favorite to Manitowoc, Wis., for repairs.

Passengers on deck at the time say they thought the shore line was a heavy bank of clouds near the horizon as did also the officers. Most of the passengers, except in number, were just dressing, but some had come on deck and some had just entered the dining saloon. The first intimation that the ship was near shore was when several shocks were felt as she struck the rocks.

The captain went ashore and telephoned to Harbor Springs for the steamer Columbia of the ferry line, which arrived shortly after 1 o'clock and the thirty passengers enroute to various points north were transferred to her and later to the S. S. Manitou of the Northern Michigan Transportation line at the entrance to the bay. No difficulty was experienced as there was little wind.

East Jordan Enterprise: Road Commissioner Horace Hipp will build the road between Boyne City and Boyne Falls. This would ordinarily have fallen to Commissioner Ed. Lorch, but Mr. Hipp's splendid work with his road making crew decided the matter. Both the county officials and the people interested in the road wanted the best road possible for the money completed at the earliest possible time, and hence the work was placed in charge of Commissioner Hipp.

Petoskey News: Miss Helen and Roy Babcock, of Charlevoix, entertained a party among the school thirty guests including three couples from Petoskey, to a birthday party, the occasion being in honor of Miss Helen Babcock, who celebrated her birthday anniversary Friday. The Petoskey young people bring word that the event was a delightful one, full of fun and a good time. A five-course dinner was served and following this dancing was enjoyed until a late hour.

THE MASONIC FAIR.

Not only Masons but the general public—in ancient Masonic parlance, "the profane"—are invited to interest themselves in the forthcoming Masonic Fair, that commences next week in Masonic Temple, Detroit.

Already the scenes of the event is assured. The splendid rooms of the Masonic Temple will be thrown open, and a fine display of short entertainments is certain.

PEARL—LOOP.

Mr. Walter W. Pearl and Miss Elizabeth A. Loop were married at the Congregational parsonage last Sunday afternoon, by Rev. C. E. Taggart. Both of the young people are residents of Harbor Springs, where Mr. Pearl follows the profession of an architect, and Mrs. Pearl was a successful teacher in the public schools for six years. They will make their home at Harbor Springs for the remainder of the season. They are young people of acceptional promise, and the best wishes of all their friends attend them as they enter upon life together.

BLACK LEG IN CATTLE.

Dr. McGreery, local veterinary surgeon, announces that he has discovered indications of the disease known as black leg in cattle in this vicinity. It is an acute infectious disease.

The only safe protective measure is vaccination with black leg vaccine before the animals become infected. Our farmers should carefully investigate for any appearance of the trouble, and promptly consult the veterinary.

DEATH OF RANSOM CRAM.

Ransom Cram an old resident of Charlevoix, and in former years in the lumber business in the firm of Cram, Whitford & Co., died at the home of his daughter, in Flint, last Thursday morning. The remains arrived here Friday evening.

Mr. Cram was born in Schuylers Falls, N. Y. December 26th, 1834. At an early age he became an engineer and drove the second engine that ran over the Ogdensburg and Rouses Point R. R. Later he came west and for some time drove a four horse stage coach between Cheboygan and Fort du Lac. When the civil war broke out he enlisted in the 4th Wisconsin Infantry and served three years under General Grant, Sherman and Thomas. He was in many battles, including Look out Mountain, Atlanta and Nashville.

At the close of the war he settled down with his family in Wisconsin, where he engaged in the lumber business with his removed to the Pine Lake region in 1885. He retired from business in 1902. Several years ago he entirely lost his eyesight. For several years he lived with his son and daughter, William and Campbell and wife, accompanying them to Flint two years ago where they have since resided.

During his illness, which became serious last August, he has exhibited remarkable patience, always looking on the bright side of life. His wife has been constantly at his side, ministering to his every want. Those left to mourn his loss are as follows: The widow, Mrs. Julia O. Cram; Maurice L. Cram, of Bellingham, Wash.; Mrs. William Cram and Miss Eva Cram, of Flint; R. D. Cram and Mrs. George Bacon, of Charlevoix, all children by his first marriage.

Deceased had been a Mason for forty years, and was at the time of his death a member of Charlevoix Lodge No. 282 F. & A. M., under the auspices of which he was buried in Brookside Sunday afternoon. The attendance was large, attesting the high regard in which he was held in this community.

Notwithstanding the fact that in his declining years the faces of his dear ones and all the beauties of nature were shut out from his vision, he always delighted in the company of his friends and brethren, and rejoiced in the blessings which God had vouchsafed to him.

Mrs. E. H. Green arrived from Chicago Thursday and is settled down in her Antrim street home for the summer.

Capt. Ed. Bedford, of the Point Betsy coast guard station and Capt. Harrison Miller, of Pyankoff, were here over Sunday to attend the funeral of the late Ransom Cram.

The Charlevoix Rock Product Co. is receiving a carload of rails for the extension of its branch road. A contract has been let for installing a new conveyor system from the crusher to the kilns.

An automobile trip through the country from this city to East Jordan is an inspiration. Everything in nature is booming. The crops are magnificent and everything is booming. The hay crop, for which there has been some worry, is being gathered and is far beyond expectations. There is every indication of bumper crops this fall.

MUSTERED IN

East Jordan Military Company Takes Its Place As A Unit Of The Michigan National Guard.

It was one of the auspicious events in the history of East Jordan Wednesday night when Co. K" ceased to exist, and Co. I, 33d Michigan Infantry, came into existence.

The company, 71 rifles, was paraded in front of the hotel and were sworn in by the brigade commander, Brigadier General John P. Kirk, assisted by Major Walter G. Rogers, quartermaster general. The entire equipment of the old Man ister company was received last week, including eighty new Springfield rifles. Arms were inventoried and all bodies uncovered as Gen. Kirk administered the oath that made the company active soldiers for a term of three years.

Following the muster Gen. Kirk gave the company a fifteen minute talk, in which he reviewed the record which, in the campaign for M. N. G. honors, involving the contest between East Jordan and Bellaire Creek resulted in the victory of East Jordan. The General told them of the unanimous vote of the military board accepting the East Jordan company. He spoke impressively of the honor conferred upon East Jordan by this action, and appealed to the citizens to stand by the company, giving them some good advice as to the duties assigned them as soldiers of the Republic. The company presented a very fine appearance, reflecting much credit upon the commissioned officers for the excellent training they have received.

Thursday morning the company assembled early at the armory, and for the first time in actual service made up their blankets rolls, gathered their camping outfit, and boarded the range for the Cheboygan rifle range for a three days shoot, under the command of Major Rogers, and instructed by Rifle Practice, and Colonel Boucher of the 33d regiment. They left on the 10:30 train, fully armed, equipped as follows: Blanket roll, consisting of blanket, poncho and one half of a "pup" tent haversack containing tin plate, knife, fork and spoon, tin coffee cup and canteen; uniform kaki, woven cartridge belt and New Springfield rifle, the best army gun in the world.

August 11th they will again entrain for the State encampment at Grayling, where they will take their first course of training in discipline and the art of war. The writer, who cannot escape the feeling that Co. I is a Charlevoix county organization, is firmly convinced that it will abundantly demonstrate the fact that the military spirit made no mistake. East Jordan is the smallest town in the state to have a military company, and its numerical strength was a distinct surprise to Gen. Kirk.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

John Henry Gets a Present

SAY! did you ever dream you were going to get a wonderful Christmas gift from a rich relation and wake up in the sickhouse?

Friend wife and I are not mercenary, but we did have a hunch that Uncle Peter would slip us an onyx clock we thought we could hide the knotholes in our phoney mantelpiece, or an assthtray ash tray which we could use as a bathtub for the canary; but nothing doing!

It was a sad time to us that Christmas morning, because the old boy is unhoused with coin. He even all the easier on the gold pieces. He has pet names for them and keeps them covered up like a flock of chickens.

And all he sent us was a book worth eighty cents, written by a pretend pen pusher named Heifenhalen.

I wanted to throw it out the window at a taxi driver engaged in overcharging his uncle for the benefit of those in the neighborhood who were sleeping late on Christmas morning, but Peaches had her elbows and chickings off and was wading through the first chapter.

The book, she informed me, was a series of essays on reincarnation.

Can you tie that for a Christmas present? Reincarnation is a long, lonesome word, and to a perfect stranger it has a slightly suspicious sound, but it hasn't a thing on Peaches in this line.

After reading about half a pallon of Hoffbrau she informed me that I began to bite her nails and make faces like a hightower.

The idea of a person having been somebody else in a previous existence is interesting isn't it, John?" she gurgled. "I wonder who I was?"

You appeared first at the dawn of Siberia, I told her, and after chasing King Solomon up a sycamore tree you disappeared for several centuries and then you slipped into history's moving pictures as Queen Esther and I'm a dog gone good mind to divorce you for the way you carried on with Marc Antony!"

"Oh, tush!" giggled Peaches. "Have some sense, silly! Do you think Mrs. Hardy was?"

"Help!" I said, "why Help originally!"

"I will take good care that you don't," chuckled the squirting giant.

"How?" was Peaches' interrogation.

"It will be in the far, far future," said the giant. "I will then be one of the Common People walking in the streets."

"And you?" David asked.

"I will be a chauffeur on a smoke wagon and what I will do to you will be a pitiful shame," responded the giant.

Then with a bitter laugh the triumphant Goliath turned over and pulled his metal coil off the shuffleboard.

Second Essay.

The ghost of Julius Caesar looked threatningly at Brutus, the Stabbist treatus answered:

"Yoh," he said, "to the utmost!"

"Not one of Caesar's muscles quivered."

Brutus used a short, sharp laugh. "Why," he said, "on the way? Caesar never batted an eyelash, Brutus polished to the rear.

"Do why back," he said. "and use your latinese."

Caesar pulled his togs up over his cold shoulder.

Brutus laughed again, and it was the saucy, triumphant laugh of the man who dodges in front of a woman and grabs a seat on the elevator railroad.

"The next time we meet you will not do me as you did me at the bust of Pompey's statue," said the ghost of Caesar, speaking for the first time since we began this essay.

"We will not meet again because I refuse to associate with you," said Brutus.

Caesar smiled, but it was without mirth, and as cold as the notice of suspension on the door of a bank.

"Yes, we will meet again," said Caesar.

"Where?" said Brutus.

"In the far, far future," said the ghost of Caesar shrieklessly. "You will be born into the world again by that time, and in your new personality you will be one of the Common People.

"And you?" inquired Brutus.

"I will be the artist which puts the finish into the sax maxim, and may heaven have mercy on your pocketbook!" shrieked the ghost of Caesar.

"Are You All In?" David Inquired, After a Pause.

was a harelip or a tree toad, probably both. Later on he appeared at a dancing derbie and made weakly pitcrimmers of himself by stepping on the portmain with giage. Then he dropped out for several hundred years to get a new set of waterlines from partwents and finally reappeared as Joe Morrison in "Bright Nights in a Barroom" and he's been playing that ever since.

"I don't see why you can't take this seriously," she pouted. "Harry Heifenhalen's book is very wonderful."

"So is a Swiss cheese sandwich," ventured. "Did you ever stop to think what wonderful these holes are in a Swiss cheese? How did they get there? You don't find them in a Camembert, do you?"

Peaches put in the storm sleasis and turned me with a baleful glance.

"It's easy enough to make fun of something you can't do yourself," she snapped.

We were on the verge of our first quarrel and all on account of an old German dope peddler, but it was up to me to host the white flag if we were to live happily ever after.

"Why, little bright eyes," said, "that's the easiest thing I do. Writing essays on reincarnation is where I live. I can put old Oscar Sauerkraut to sleep now if I have the punch in every paragraph. Where's my fountain pen? I'll show you!"

"Indeed!" said she and she as she flounced out of the room. So it was up to me to make good and I was easier for forever lose the life of Captain.

So I dashed off the following globes of thought, left them on the center table where she'd be sure to find them, and scooted into the kitchen to see what surprises lay hiding in the tin cans.

First Essay.

David kept his coat on the rack of the fallen Goliath and laughed pleasantly.

"Are you all in?" David inquired, after a pause.

"I refuse to speak until you take your spurs out of my face," replied the giant.

David at once showed his obliging nature.

"We shall meet again," Goliath replied bicarerly.

"Not if I see you first!" said David

"Look, John! Isn't Uncle Peter a Dry Old Fox?"

reading it, because an apology wasn't necessary.

Isn't she the limit in imported chilren, I ask you?

HER SIDE OF THE CLOTH

Younger Sister Was Anticipating What in Time She Knew Would Be Here.

How often it is that the younger of two children in a family is at a disadvantage, in the matter of what is done for him, the clothes which he wears and the attention which he receives generally. It is sometimes pathetic although occurring not so much from any real difference in the feelings of the parents for the two as from thoughtlessness and the natural order of things. The handing down of clothes from older to younger, for example, is almost necessary in many a family, but it is a hardship for the younger one, nevertheless.

One family once had two girls in exactly this situation, the younger being just so much behind her sister in growth and development that it came perfectly natural that the elder's dresses should fall to her lot in the course of time. And so it happened that all the new things were the elder's and the younger always had them made over for her.

One day the elder was told by her mother to go down and collect some material which she liked for her graduation dress and bring it home for approval. Full of plan, the girl started to go, when the younger spoke up in all seriousness. "Don't you think I ought to go with her, mamma? and she, "to see if I like the other side?"

It set the mother to thinking, and after that the younger got some new things of her very own.—Rochester, N. H., Courier.

In Old Porto Rico.

In the vicinity of Mayaguez, Porto Rico, are several historically interesting places. The little village of Rio Guarenas, near Anaaco, was the scene of the unique experiment by which the Indians, in 1511, endeavored to discover whether the Spaniards were immortal.

After building a Spanish nobleman upon water six hours they were assured that those intruders were just as subject to death as themselves.

About seven miles from Mayaguez, across a rough mountainous country, is the famous sanctuary of Monserrat, which is visited every year by many pilgrims.

Situated conspicuously among its surroundings, its large stone church is visible for many miles. From the summit of the mountain is the lightful view of the beautiful plain through which flow the Roquerron and Grande rivers.

How Shoe Peg Was Invented.

"To a Massachusetts man, Joseph Walker, is due the credit of inventing the shoe peg. Previous to the year 1818 its use had not been known, and the cobbler was forced to depend on the manufacture of boots and shoes.

"Shortly after the introduction of this ingenious pere unscrupulous settlers are said to have tried to swindle the unsuspecting by endeavoring to sell him a wooden peg as a new kind of oats.

"Up to 1818 boots and shoes had been sewed, and the peg, made first by hand, came in to revolutionize the trade. It was however, the cousin of shoemakers who lived away from the manufacturing centers to make their own pegs by hand even as late as 1880, but the machine-manufactured peg has now superseded them.

Remark Somewhat Unkind.

Lord Cockburn, after a long stroll, sat down on a hillside beside a shepherd and observed that the shepherd felicted the coolest situation for lying down. "Man," said he, "I think if I were a sheep, I should certainly have preferred the other side of that hill." The shepherd answered: "Ay, my lord; but if you had been a sheep ye would have had mair sense." And Lord Cockburn was never tired of relating the story and turning the laugh on himself.

Psychologist Money.

"The every man, woman and child in this country has $1,265 in psychological money, much psychological. Wall Street Journal.

An Awkward Position

TEXT—Mat. 1 not see there in the garden with bad—John 12.

Peter's position as indicated by this question depends on two or three things; the person to whom it was addressed, the person referred to in the closing remarks of the circumstances that the question involved. The person addressed was Peter, the person referred to in the closing remarks was Jesus, the circumstances were about these: Jesus was on trial before the Roman governor; Peter was in an outer hallway warmed by a fire, one of the maids connected with the household of the governor recognized Peter as one that she had seen in the garden of Gethsemane with Jesus and she at once accused him of being a disciple of Jesus by asking the question, "Art thou also one of the disciples that indicated Peter's position grew more baleful every time.

Companionship Indicates Discipleship.

If Peter was with Jesus he was prior from his association, Peter was gathering his disciples his frequent word was, "Follow me." We read that Matthew left all and followed Jesus, and so on through the gospels. "Sell that thou hast and follow me." "Whosoever will come after me let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." We find that the disciples attached themselves to the person of Jesus because they were his disciples or followers, keeping within easy reach of the great teacher's voice. Jesus Christ does not ask this mark of discipleship does not guaranty of reciprocal companionship. He fulfilled to the letter the promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." He will be with the Christian even he is beside still we turn, but also with him when he walks through the fire, and this companionship with Jesus, considered from both standpoints, constitutes the proof of disciples on this earth are to be with him where he is forever more.

Disciple Cannot Escape Recognition.

Christians are marked men, not with the stigma such as St. Francis had received, but marked in a way easily discovered by the world. A professor of a theological seminary delivering a new class entering the institution, addressed them as follows: "You are marked men." They soon found out that on the streets, in the cars, in social circles and elsewhere, they were recognized as theologues. The disciples of Christ have conferred upon by a public union with the Christian church and thus recognized as single members. The world primarily understands that church membership means the profession of Christ and that many church members are to their vows, yet the least distinguishing mark of a the Christian is his profession. He must bear about with him every day the marks of the Lord Jesus as Paul did. He must be always doing the will of God, going about doing good, manifesting his true character as a servant of all, and showing the spirit of self sacrifice, even unto death.

Test of Discipleship.

The test of Peter's discipleship here was the most trying one that could have been put on him as a disciple of Jesus. It gave him an opportunity of showing the true fiber of his character and thus proclaim to all hearers that his master is to out disciple to be a Christian on the Lord's day or in the revival meeting, but it is difficult to be a Christian when one is surrounded by drunkards, profane swearers and the licentious. It was a hard thing for a believer to be a Christian in Peter's day, for that city was infamous in its immorality, but it was the river to be sincere where he was, and this difficulty primarily had its root in the fact in being where he ought not to have been. The greatest pains the Christian suffers is in the regions he receives from the world because of his inconsistencies. There is a peculiar delight among the people of the world in casting up the inconsistencies of Christians to them. Peter was true enough in the garden, but before the cock crew twice he was in a place where he was brave enough in the garden, but before the kitchen maid he was timid.

But it is before the world that the best testimony can be made. Indeed, it is the Christian's business to witness to a world of sin. The boldness of the master himself was given in the words, "Before the world I spake openly." That testimony has stood and is as effective today as when first given. Let the memory of Jesus Christ, as we might say the tradition of Jesus Christ, has a place in the world that nothing else can take.

Eaa of Apostasy.

And there is an incidental suggestion in connection with Peter's base denial, in the idea of the danger of companionship with Jesus Christ to apostasy. It cost a long one. Peter was in a true sense a prisoner among the soldiers, yet the time denial of his Lord is told as widely as the periods of Judas Iscariot himself.

"To rest in any other hope than in Jesus Christ with too great confidence is dangerous.

In Formosa.

The Synod of Formosa, organized in 1913, announces that whereas 50 years ago there was not a single worshipper of God in Formosa there are now 5,000 baptized and 200 Christian workers evangelizing the island

"How many pancakes do you suppose you could eat at a sitting?" inquired Uncle George, as he watched his little nephew stowing them away.

"I don't know," said the boy. "The most I ever had a chance to eat was twenty-four. Ma won't let me try for a record."

Force of Habit.

"I'll bet that man used to be a street car conductor," said the bride groom as they came out of the office of the minister of the gospel.

"What makes you think so?" asked his bride.

"When I handed him his fee for marrying us, he asked me if I wanted a transfer?"

Time's Changes.

"You know when I was living here five years ago," remarked the man who had just dropped in, "you had a little boy about six years old whom you used to call Theodore Roosevelt."

"Yes, I remember" was the reply; "but he's been through college since then."

A Spinster's Warning.

Sile said to her, from experience in matrimony from what she said, but I'm not the first spinster who was a spinster. She had been sitting in the corner of a Spanish inn in the peace while he was preparing to marry a couple in his private office. Sile said that publishing in the chancery was not a pleasant, and she let know it.

Finally she had stood the laughing of the bridegroom long enough, she thought, and she squared the following in a high-pitched voice:

"Marriage is not to be laughed at. It is a serious thing like going to church."—Indianapolis News.

Aurora Refuses to Die.

Aurora, probably the oldest mining camp in the state of Nevada, the famous camp that only revived as a mining community, but it begrutty has show an unusual metropolitan aspect. The fourth of July celebration of Mineral county, writes a correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle, was held at Aurora and close to 2,000 people were entertained.

The entrance of the Goldfield Consolidated Mining company, the big Nevada-Wonder mine, to the camp has stimulated an unusual interest in Aurora, and the mining property has been taken over by the Wingfield interests, a new mill erected and a development campaign of close to $10,000 is now being realized.

Russian Victory.

General Ivan Fedorovich sat in his room and studied the map. Then he rang the bell at his elbow, in came Sergius Julioffski, his aide-de-camp.

"What are your orders, excellency?"

"Sergius Julioffski, glance over this map. Do you see this little town?"

"I do, excellency."

"That hill must be captured. Attend to the matter and let me know when it is done."

"Yes, excellency."

"Twenty minutes passed and there was a knock at the door. Sergius strode in, clicked his heels together, and saluted.

"Well, what is it, Sergius, my son?"

"I have the honor to announce, excellency, that the hill has been captured."

"Already captured! Fine, my son. Sire! Who occupies it?"

"The Germans, excellency."

JOHN'S DEDUCTION AT FAULT

Result of Bright Youth's Reasoning Brought Consternation to His Employer.

John was the new boy at the boarding house. His relations were sadden by his behavior. He was a boy of the period, a product of progress or of improvement common to all growing cities, or effused in the manifold surprises now of the topography of the Old Town, than which none other in Christendom has undergone more. Still, if not the Medieval things, the sites of a select number of them could be identified for him, and their story or legend rehearsed, while the Artist's pencil would reproduce yet remaining bits of the Old Jumbled with the New.

Properly our initial ramble was within the narrow bounds of the beginnings of the Puritan capital, the "metropolis of the wilderness," hanging on the harbor's edge of the little "peninsula," behilled peninsula, for which the founders, those "well-educated, polite persons of good estate," took Old Boston in England for their model. The Lincolnshire borough on the Fenlands was to be to them, only in name. The founders would have their capital town be to New England in the humble set where Anodos was to Old England. So Boston was builded, a likeness in miniature to London.

The London street plan, the prominent aspect, we remarked, reminded to and through the Revolution, and in a shadowy way reminded us, our guest would see. It was indeed a natural family likeness, for, as the record shows, both from the beginning was the central point of the most thoroughly English community in the New World. There was no infusion of a foreign element in consequence until the end of the colony period and the time of the Revolution was over. But while some of the people retained this element become sufficient to numbers to set up a church of its own and to bring about some softening of the old austerities of the Puritan town life, it did not impair the English stamp. Those French Huguenots easily assimilated in the community, which welcomed them, and in time there emerged artisans and merchants, the Bowditches, the Faneuils, Chardons, Bigonnoyes, Revolutionaries, Greenleafs, became almost as English, or American English, as the rest. PROBABLY no American city has quite the marked individuality that Boston has, and yet, in the twentieth century progress and improvement has done but little to obliterate its picturesque aspects, for, for which antiquarians are duly thankful. One of them, Edward M. Huxon, has written a book about it. He calls it "Rambles Around Old Boston." Two publishers are Little, Brown & Co.

We were three—a visiting Englishman, the Artist and Antiquary, says Mr. Huxon. The Artist and Antiquary were the gossiping guides; the Englishman the pupil. "The Englishman would 'do' Old Boston exclusively. He had 'done' the blend of the Old and New, and now would back back to the Old and review it in leisurely strolls among its landmarks. He had asked the Artist and Antiquary to join him conjointly, and they would meet his wishes, and gladly, for the personal conducting of a stranger is saturated with Old Boston lore as he appeared to be could not be other than agreeable.

Beyond the few monumental historic memorials, the landmarks he especially would seek were those of them Boston, long overshadowed by the peaceful marches of progress or of improvement common to all growing cities, or effused in the manifold surprises now of the topography of the Old Town, than which none other in Christendom has undergone more. Still, if not the Medieval things, the sites of a select number of them could be identified for him, and their story or legend rehearsed, while the Artist's pencil would reproduce yet remaining bits of the Old Jumbled with the New.

So, too, we find yet lingering, though long since in disuse, and old Lane between thoroughfares, or passage between courts or courtyards, or alley, or court, or passage, or court, or passage, or court, or passage

No Problem to Solve

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1915, by W. G. Chapman.)

Some men at the club had brought up the of problem of who owned mother. Which should a man save, if he were struggling with them in the water? Then it was that Merrill told this story.

"Sotheby had been out boating with his fiancee, Evelyn, and her little crippled sister, Mollie," he said. "I think that problem was still harder. Ordinarily, of course, his duty would have been to save his fiancee; but Mollie was lame—had been so from birth. She could walk, after a fashion, but she couldn't have swum, and she was far too frail and delicate to risk for her life in such a life as Eight Mile race.

"He knew Evelyn could swim like a fish, too. The girls were staying at North Cliff when he went to see them. He had met Evelyn a few weeks before, in town. He knew she and her sister were orphans. They had hardly a relative in the world. Sotheby had become engaged a week or two before, and he was madly in love with Evelyn, and the envy of all the other men who admired her dashing beauty.

"I think his predicament was worse. It was about half a mile to the land, and Evelyn could probably have made it. Mollie was helpless. Sotheby did not know what to do. He acted on impulse. He saved Mollie.

"He never knew how the boat had overturned. He was trying to bring the tiller around and let the boom go when they found themselves in the water and clinging to the overturned boat, which was drifting rapidly out to sea.

"He saw Evelyn struggling beside him, and Mollie sinking. Quick as a flash Sotheby grabbed Mollie by the hair. He lost sight of Evelyn. He knew beyond me; save both girls, and he could not let Mollie go. Alternately swimming and treading water, he managed, in utter exhaustion, to get Mollie ashore. Then he fainted.

"He awakened in a fisherman's cottage. Mollie was upstairs and doing well. The next day he saw her. He had not dared to ask about his fiancee; everybody knew she was drowned. To his astonishment Mollie seemed almost unconcerned.

"It was a tiny fishing village, and the tragedy thought it attired the shock was not widely reported. After Mollie and he had recovered the girl gave up the little cottage and went home.

"You must let me come as soon as you, for Evelyn's sake," said Sotheby. "He was rather astonished when Mollie positively refused. 'I hear you no ill will, Jack, and I owe you my life,' she said. 'But I feel that it would be impossible after—what has happened.'

"The girl's uncanny calmness shocked John. However, there was nothing to do but acquiesce. It was a year before he saw Mollie again. They met on Fifth avenue, and the recognition was mutual. Mollie told Jack Sotheby that she was living with an old aunt in an apartment uptown.

"That had been a hard period for Sotheby. He knew that the shadow over his life would deepen rather than disappear as the years went on. And yet, strangely enough, he began to realize that he had not truly loved Evelyn. Their meeting and engagement had been rapid, and there had been no communion of souls between them. It had been infatuation, said, in spite of the friendly, Jack thought of Evelyn as an episode in his life—rather than the love love.

"When he looked at Mollie he was conscious of a sudden awakening of interest in the frail girl, whose beauty had developed until she seemed a replica of Evelyn—less dashing, less vivacious, but the Evelyn whom he would have loved rather than the one he had known.

"I am coming to see you, Mollie," he said. And this time the girl did not refuse.

"Weeks passed, their intimacy deepened. The girl was becoming very dear to Sotheby. At last the day arrived when he felt that the shadow which hung over them ought to be lifted.

"'Mollie,' he said, taking the girl's hands in his, 'I want to tell you, dear, that I love you. I want to ask you to be my wife. I feel that you and I have something inseparable, something that makes our lives one. I'm Evelyn, and yet I never cared for Evelyn as I love you.'

"The girl looked at him, and then, to Sotheby's amusement, she burst into passionate weeping.

"'I can never marry you, Jack,' she sobbed. 'You do not know—Oh, you do not know, and I cannot bring myself to tell you.'

"'But you love me, Molly?' he cried.

"He took her in his arms, and for an instant her head lay on his shoulder.

"'Yes, I love you,' she said. 'But I cannot marry you.' She raised her head and looked him frankly in the eyes. 'Listen, Jack,' she said. 'I have loved you since I first saw you, and I have never loved anyone else. That is why I must send you away. It is because of Evelyn.'

"He could find no answer to make. He bowed his head and went away. It was another year before he saw Mollie again. This time he was at Atlantic City.

"He was seated in a secluded corner by the Boardwalk when he saw Mollie coming toward him. At first he thought, so striking was the resemblance, that she was Evelyn herself. Then, as he watched her, he saw Evelyn in the flesh, at her side, and, beside Evelyn, a man.

"The trio were advancing toward him, and Evelyn and the man were engaged in animated conversation. Evelyn had grown stouter and fresher; she was still the dashing beauty of old times, but the dashingness could not carry itself so well under that accumulated load of flesh. It was overdone, and the woman was obviously too artificial. The hair was too light, the eyes too dark. Sotheby stared. He could not be mistaken. It was Evelyn.

"Sotheby was not superstitious. He knew that Evelyn was at Mollie's side, and he rose and followed them to their hotel. He watched them enter, and all that day he waited until he was rewarded at last by seeing Mollie come out alone. She walked, with her limping gait, along the Boardwalk until she came to the same place where Sotheby had sat that morning. There she sat down, and there he accosted her.

"The terror in the girl's eyes almost unnerved him. She glanced at him fearfully, and saw that he knew all.

"'You have seen her?' she cried, with a quick catch of breath.

"Sotheby nodded. 'Tell me the truth, Mollie,' he said, taking her hand in his. 'And be kind to me. I know that, although it was not the same Evelyn whom he had loved, it was just the same Mollie who had been so dear to him, who had always been in his thoughts, night and day, since he had learned to love her.

"'She is not dead,' said Sotheby. 'But—Mollie, tell me the truth, and trust me.'

"'Yes, I will tell you the truth,' answered the girl. 'When you became engaged to Evelyn you looked on it as a serious matter, but to Evelyn it was just a joke, a summer flirtation. She gets engaged at least two or three times every summer. When you looked on it as something lasting Evelyn was—well, just plain scared. She liked you well enough to become engaged to you, but she never loved you, Jack. Why, Evelyn couldn't love anybody. The man she is engaged to now is rich, and she will probably marry him; but she never intended to marry you.

"'You frightened her, Jack, and because she really did care for you in a way, she was afraid that she might not be able to help marrying you. And you were not a rich man, not rich enough for Evelyn. I didn't know what she was going to do, but I knew that she was planning to do something, because she was mad with fear when you came down to North Cliff.

"'You know she can swim. She told me afterwards—she sent me a letter while I was in the fisherman's house, before you came up to see me. She had upset the boat, knowing that you would take care of me, because I could not swim. When the boat upset Evelyn dived and climbed out and hid behind the rocks. She waited there until she saw that we were safe, and then she ran home and changed her dress, packed up and ran away. That was to prevent your knowing that she was alive. She wanted you to think her dead, so as to escape marrying you.

"'And you knew all that, Mollie? And that was why you forbade me to see you?'

"'Yes,' cried the girl. 'And when I was living with my aunt I could see you, because Evelyn had gone West. But I dared not let you love me.'

"'But I have always loved you, Mollie,' said Jack. 'I love you now, dear.'

"He took her in his arms and kissed her. And this time they knew that there was no obstacle to their happiness.

"'Why, dear,' said Mollie presently, 'if Evelyn marries that man they will go West to live. You won't want to see her again. Can you wait two weeks longer until I send for you to come to me?'

"He laughed. 'I have waited two years, Mollie,' he answered. 'I think I can wait two weeks longer—for you, not Evelyn.'

Growth of Judgment

Nobody's judgment is good without development. One who forms the habit of accepting the opinions of others who allows his pain to be racked out for him by interested friends, cannot expect that his judgment will be any thing but feeble, like an unused muscle. Only by thinking can one learn to think. Only by deciding does one master the power of wise decision. Judgment must have regular exercise to become worthy of dependence.

WOMAN SCULPTOR IS FARMER

Can Do All the Work on Place When Help is Not Otherwise Available.

Grass Valley, Cal.—Among those who have added to the orchard acreage of this section this spring is Miss Amanda Austin at Applegate.

Miss Austin is widely known in the world of sculpture and artistic painting. The last two years she elected to live on a farm at Applegate, where the surroundings are pleasing to one of her tastes and attainments. Her abode is a large two-story frame house on an entrance near the station and overlooking the orchard and pleasant orchard foothills with the snow-capped Sierras for a background. A more sightly spot could hardly have been selected for a home. Although Miss Austin has not lost sight of the practical side of a young fruit grower.

"Her farm is too large to be cared for by her alone, however, and when the necessary help is not to be had she takes a hand herself. And there is no work about the place she cannot do, whether it be setting out fruit trees or shingling the roof. This Austin put out 1,300 young pear trees which, when grown, will add to the revenue as well as the appearance of the place.

Little Fresh Water in Adriatic.

Owing to the system of receiving mountains the Adriatic receives but little streams for themselves. The rolling rivers of any considerable size that empty into it, the Adige and the Po, are almost the only ones therefore is very salty. Navigation is generally safe, although there are some fine geysers points upon the eastern coast, and sudden and northern squalls often flash the waters with terrific force against the rock-bound coast.

BLIND LAWYER WINS SUIT

Gets Damages of $20,000 for Client in Negligence Case in New York.

New York.—Calvin McClelland, D. D., a blind lawyer and former minister, was successful in a suit for $20,000 before Justice Garretson in the Supreme court. The suit was a negligence action brought by Joseph Mooney, mason, residing at 725 Sixth avenue, against William Cantley, a contractor, for damages for injuries sustained by Mooney while working for Cantley and which resulted in the loss of his right leg.

Dr. McClelland was forced to give up his work in the church because of his failing eyesight. He had conducted a successful ministry at the Memorial Presbyterian church. After leaving the ministry, he took up the study of law, and although his sight continued to fail until he became blind, he persevered in his studies and was finally admitted to the bar. He is a well known figure in the courts of Brooklyn.

Dr McClelland is gradually recovering the use of his right eye. Although totally blind four years ago, he can now see the outline of objects, but the impression is dim and blurred. He uses a typewriter by means of the touch system.

HAS BULLET HOLE IN EYE

Victim of Accidental Shot Is Expected to Be Himself Again.

Hoisington, Kan.—There is a case in the hospital in this city that is attracting the attention of physicians throughout western Kansas. Clay Brubaker, fourteen years old, the son of a McCracken man, was the victim of an accidental shot from a gun three weeks ago, a small bullet striking him in his left eye and passing through the cerebrum of the brain, coming out through the top of the brain.

In passing through the brain the bullet did not actually destroy any of the brain cells but severed the optic nerve fibers. The bullet was removed. Young Brubaker was unconscious for several days and no hopes were entertained for his recovery.

He has regained consciousness and recognizes friends and makes his wants known by signs. He cannot talk and his right side is paralyzed. The attending physicians say that he will recover and there will probably be no bad effects from the injury.

NOW NUMBERS HIS CHILDREN

Father of Family in Kentucky Long Ago Ran Out of Names.

Louisville.—If any person in Pendleton county needs a fourteen passenger automobile it must be County Assessor John McClanahan. Well, he actually tried to get his family all in a buggy recently and go to church one Sunday school picnic party and only leaving one brother until they were told that John McClanahan was taking a section of the Christian church congregation of McKinnegsburg to spend the day with relatives. Several tried to comb down, but made no headway, as one little fellow kept moving about so they could not count him. Some made a good guess, and that was to the effect that he had a buggy load. John has got the run of names and gone to numbering them. He has based out of the room but we don't know where he started nor do we know or even attempt to guess where he will stop.

HAS NOVEL WEDDING SUIT

Farmer Bridegroom In Kansas Led to Altar in Plaster Cast.

Salina, Kan.—Miss Mary Elizabeth Swaner came all the way to Saline county from Fayetteville, O., to become the bride of Francis de Sales Strait, of a young farmer near Salina, and when they came near enough out for a delay at least, but she was equal to the occasion and it is now Scheidler's bride.

The promised delay in the nuptial affairs of this young couple was caused by Scheidler getting into a runaway accident and sustaining a broken leg, fractured ribs and bruises all over his body, and he nevertheless found himself bound in plaster of paris casts so tight he could not move.

The situation was discussed, the young man secured up the favorite horse in a buggy and came to Salina, secured the marriage license, engaged the preacher and returned to the farm.

FIREMEN NOW KNIT SHAWLS

Sandusky Fire Stations Lay Away the Checkerboards and Take to Yarn.

Sandusky.—Sandusky firemen are knitting, not socks for soldiers, but shawls for themselves. The knitting idea was put into their heads a few weeks ago when a fireman from one of the Sandusky stations visited the local Central station and remarked that knitting is the principal amusement of Columbus firemen.

Cards and checkerboards were promptly put aside, and now almost any evening firemen in each one of Sandusky's five stations may be seen sitting around with yarn, knitting needles and [illegible] well on the way to completion.

STUDENTS RUN FROG FARM

Kansas Youths Work Their Way Through University by Curious Business Enterprise.

Lawrence, Kan.—Frogs and turtles are taking Donald Carpenter and Harvey Kerr through the University of Kansas. The two students have devised a scheme to supply the university biological laboratories with frogs and turtles for experiments and are doing well rewarded financially.

Because of the dry climate of Kansas few frogs or turtles are found here. The university tried importing the 3,000 frogs and 1,500 turtles it uses each year from Chicago and Detroit, but the long trip proved impractical.

On a vacation trip to the Ozarks, Carpenter and Kerr caught a large number of the amphibians and domesticated them in the waterfilled cellar of a deserted house in Lawrence, where they multiplied rapidly enough to meet all the needs of the laboratories.

FACTS ABOUT BLIND

Affliction Less Common in America Than Other Countries.

More Prevalent Among Man Than Among Women—More Blind Indians and Negroes Than Whites—Many Self-Supporting.

Washington.—The blind population of the United States in 1910 numbered 57,272, or 62.8 to each 100,000 of the total population in that year. Blindness is less common in America than in most other countries; it has apparently decreased among the youngest classes of the population in the last half century; it is more prevalent among men than among women; it is very much more prevalent among Indians and negroes than among whites. Trades taught in schools or workshops or in the home enable more than 1,500 blind persons for total or partial self-support.

These are some of the facts brought out in a bulletin, "The Blind Population of the United States, 1910," recently issued by Director Sam L. Rogers of the bureau of the census, Department of commerce, and prepared under the direction of Dr. Joseph A. Hill, expert special agent in charge of revision and results.

The total number of blind persons in the United States exceeds estimates by 2,000. The only countries and provinces in which the ratio of the blind to the total population are lower than that of the United States (62.8 per 100,000) are Canada, where the ratio was 44.8 per 100,000 in 1911; Belgium, where it was 45.4 in 1910; Germany, 52.7 in 1910; Germany, 60.9 in 1905; Saxony, 61.8 in 1910; New South Wales, 61.4 in 1911; western Australia, 62.3 in 1911; and New Zealand, 62.3 in 1911.

In the United States blindness is more prevalent in New Mexico and Delaware than in other states.

The total population in 1910 were 105.3 to 100,000 and 118.5 to 100,000, respectively. The high ratio for these states are due to the fact that Indians, among whom trachoma (granulated eyelids) is of frequent occurrence in those sections of the country, constitute a relatively large element in the population. In Arizona, Kentucky, Tennessee and Vermont the ratios are also higher than the average, 81, 75, 72 respectively. The relatively large number of blind in Delaware is responsible for the high ratio in that state; stationers in prevalence in certain parts of Kentucky and Tennessee, and in Vermont there are relatively more people of advanced ages than in other parts of the country, to which fact in each state, since susceptibility to blindness increases with advancing age.

In 1850 and at every succeeding census the proportion of blind has been greater among males than among females.

Although blindness may occur at any time of life, it is probably a frequent incident to old age. In fact approximately one-third—44.4 per cent—of the blind population reported in 1910 were sixty years of age and over, whereas only about one-fifteenth—6.8 per cent—of the total population were sixty years of age and over.

Among native whites, the number of blind persons per 100,000 population of the same race and nativity was only fifty-five, whereas for the total population the ratio was 64.4 to 100,000. The corresponding ratios for other elements of the population were, Foreign-born whites, 74.5 to 100,000; negroes, 90 to 100,000; Indians, 302.6 to 100,000; Chinese, Japanese and all other races, 32.2 to 100,000. The fact that blindness is more common among foreign-born than among native whites is, however, due to the fact that the former class contains relatively more people of advanced age than does the latter.

Of the 91,472 blind males ten years of age and over in 1910, only 7,976, or 8.5 per cent, were reported as being gainfully employed, while of the 24,800 blind females ten years of age and over only 1,346, or 5.4 per cent, were reported as gainfully employed. The corresponding percentages with reference to the total population were 61.3 males and 23.4 for females. It does not follow, however, that more than 3,000 blind persons were actually self-supporting, since in most cases their earnings were far from sufficient to constitute a livelihood, and often amounted to a mere pittance of less than $.00 a year. In this connection it should, of course, be borne in mind that a very considerable proportion of the blind population have already passed the age when retirement from active employment usually occurs, so that the number of blind persons not reporting an occupation does not by any means indicate the number of individuals lost to the working force of the United States by reason of blindness.

Of the 7,976 blind males reported as gainfully employed, 1,768, or 22 per cent, were returned as farmers; 652, or 8.2 per cent, as farm laborers; 646, or 8.1 per cent, as musicians and teachers of music; 619, or 7.8 per cent, as retail merchants and dealers (other than hucksters and peddlers); 401, or 5 per cent, as hucksters and peddlers; 349, or 4.4 per cent, as piano tuners; and 243, or 3 per cent, as chair caners.

COULDN'T SPEND HER MONEY

American Girl in Paris Was Entirely Willing, But the Government Interfered.

The girl who was born under the star of extravagance, whatever that was, was praised for her amazing economy.

"Just think," her people said, "of having all that money over there in Paris, and not spending it."

"Don't blame me," the girl protested with unblushing candor. "It was not my fault. I wanted to spend it, but I could not; I couldn't get at it. In spite of myself, I was forced into the paths of economy by the French government."

At the beginning of the war it solved all the business problems by making my trunk my banker. What money I had was drawn out of the bank and deposited in my trunk. That seemed a pretty safe place, as most of my money was left there when I went to London on a visit.

I had made my home in Paris with an old school friend. While I was in London her husband died.

"When I came back it was as much as I could do to get into the house. The government had been in and had clapped red seals fastened to the ends of a piece of tape, across everything about the place.

"My own trunk had not escaped. Right across the lock was a band of tape with the words of liberty, Equality, Fraternity, above and below. They did not represent much liberty for me; they came nearer to representing captivity, for I had run up debts, and the only money I had to pay them with was in that trunk.

"Among some such a bargain sale, it consisted of lace and feathers and jewelry that had belonged to a very fine lady who was going out of mourning. They were sold at private sale and I was offered first pick of anything I wanted.

"For three months, while all the testifying entanglements of French law were being unraveled, my money was impounded. When my affairs after were finally settled and the seals removed, the bargains I secured had been sold elsewhere, so I had saved my money."

CHAPTER XX.

—16—

He That Was Dead.

"Yes it is, the unlucky penny; Old Galahad, in fresh and blood and bone. I should have stole over it, Arthur. It isn't worth while. I can see that you haven't changed much, unless it is that your hair is a little paler at the temples. Gray? I'll wager I've a few myself." There was a flippancy in his tone that grinded Warrington's own ears, for certainly the light speech did not come from within. At heart he was sober enough.

To study the thundering beat of his pulse he crossed the room, righted the chair, stacked the books and laid them on the desk. Arthur did not move a muscle to turn his head and to follow with fascinated gaze his brother's movements.

"Now, Arthur, I've only a little while. I can see by your eyes that you are conjuring up all sorts of terrible things. But nothing is going to happen. I am going to talk to you then I'm going away; and tomorrow it will be easy to convince yourself that you have seen only a ghost. Sit down. I'll take this chair at the left."

Arthur slowly slid from the desk; he kind of perhaps he sat down. Still deaf he laid his head upon his arms, and a great sob shook his frame across his shoulders. Warrington felt his heart swell. The past faded away; his wrongs became vapors. He saw only his brother, the boy he had loved devotedly. Arty, his other self, his scholarly other self. Why blame Arty? He loved him, he thought.

"Don't take it like that, Arty," he said.

The others hand stretched out slowly toward the voice. "Ah, great God, Paul!"

"I know! Perhaps I've branded too much." Warrington crushed the hand in his two strong ones. "The main fault was mine. I couldn't see the length of my nose. I threw a temptation in your way which none but a saint could have resisted. That night, when I got your note telling me what you had done, I did a damnably foolish thing. I went to the club bar and drank liquor. I was sorry I told you, but I couldn't see now. At two in the morning I thought I saw the way. Previous to that I had strange ideas into their heads. You were the apple of the mother's eyes; I was only her son. You was denying it. She worshiped you; contrarily to me. I came back to the house, packed up what I absolutely needed, and took the first train west. It all depended upon what you'd do. You let me go, Arty, old boy; I suppose you were pretty well knocked up when you learned what I had done. And then, you let things drift. It was only natural. I had opened the way for you. Mother, learning that I was a thief, restored the defalcation to save the family honor, which was your future. We were always more or less hard pressed for funds. It did not trouble, I wasted a lot. The mother gave us an allowance. Of five thousand each. To life I managed to add another five and you another four. You were always borrowing from me. I never questioned what you did with it I would to God I had! It would have saved us a lot of trouble."

The hand in his relaxed and slipped from the chair.

"Some of these things will sound bitter, but the heart behind them isn't. So I did what I thought to be a great and glorious thing. I was sober when I reached Chicago. I saw my deed from another angle. Think of it; we could have given our point zone to Henderson back for the amount. Old Henderson would have discounted it in a second. It was too late. I went on. The few hundred I had gave out. I've been up against it pretty hard. There were times when I envied the girls who I saw in those cases assaulted, knocked, and let go. Yes, I returned to make restitution, only to learn that it had been made by you long ago. A trick of Jenne Finance. I shouldn't have come back if I could have sent the money."

Arthur raised his head and sat up. "Ah, why did you not write? Why did you not let me know where you were? Look in my wallet, it was there a year for you yearned for you I had a man hunting. He gave up. I believed you dead."

"Dead? Well, I was in a sense."

"You have suffered, but not as I have. Have those sins had before you your great, splendid, foolish sacrifice. I had nothing to buoy me up; there was only the drag of the resolution of an evil deed, and a moment of pitiful weakness. The temptation was too great, Paul."

"How did it happen?"

"How does anything like that happen? Curiosity drew me first, for at college I never played but a few games of bridge. Curiosity, desire, then the full hours of the passion. You will never know what I did, Paul. It is stronger than love, or faith, or honor. God knows I fought against my weak: at school I was the least important of them all. Continually bullied, and they chasted me from the start. Hounds and fawn. Then I put my hand in the sale. To this day I cannot tell why I yowed nothing to those despicable thieves, Craig least of all."

"Craig, I sent him over there. Pumpkin head."

"I didn't act like a man. Some day a comfortable fortune would fall to the lot of each of us. But I took eight thousand, lost it, and came waiting to you. You don't belong to this petty age, Paul. You ought to have been a fighter of the round table." Arthur smiled wanly. "To throw your life away like that, for a brother who wasn't fit to lace your shoes! If you had written you would have learned that everything was submitted over. The Andes people dropped the matter entirely. You loved the mother far better than I."

"And she must never know," quietly.

"Do you mean that?"

"I always mean everything I say, Arty. Can't you see the uselessness of telling her now? She has gone all three years with the belief that I am a thief. A thief, Arty, I, who never stole anything save a farmer's apples. They would have called you a defaulter; that's because you had access to the safe, whereas I had none." Arthur winced. "I don't propose to disillusion the mother. I am strong enough to do away without seeing her; and God knows how my heart yearns, and my ears and eyes and arms."

Warrington reached mechanically for the pipe in the silver frame, but Arthur stayed his hand.

"No, Paul; that is gone."

Warrington dropped his hand, puzzled. "I was not going to destroy it, Arty."

"No; but in a sense you have destroyed it. Nicotine-poisoned. What trifling thought most of us give that word! The use of nicotine. For ten years Elsa has been the flower of the corn for me. She almost loved me. And one day I thought that in that one day all that I had gained was lost, and all that you had lost was gained. The law of compensation. Sometimes we escape retribution, but never the law of compensation. Some months ago she wrote me a letter. She was married. I said to myself, I was a just letter."

I pause. Arthur gazed steadily at the portrait, while Warrington twisted his yellow beard.

"The ways of mothers are mysterious", said the latter, finally. He wondered if Arthur would confess to the blackmail, or have it forced from him. He would wait and see. The father and the mother weren't happy. Money. Where the wedge. It is in every life somewhere. A marriage of convenience is an awkwardness. When we were born the mother turned to us. To to this time we were six or seven there was no distinction in her love for us. But on the day the father sat on the chesterfield, she shifted upon you. You'll never know how I suffered as a boy, when I saw the distance growing wider and wider with the years. Perhaps the father understood, for he was always kind and gentle to me. I expect to return to China shortly. The Andes has taken me back. Sounds like a fairy tale; eh? I shall never regret what I have done. Did you know Miss Chetwood was?"

"Not until that letter came."

Neither of them heard the faint sigh which came from behind the portieres dividing the study and the living room. The gasp had followed the little knife-thrusts of these confidences. The woman behind those portieres had waited and listened at the latch. With cruel vividness she saw the terrible degradation of that to which she had never given more than a passing thought. No reproaches, only a simple declaration of what had bowed in this boy's heart. And she felt almost forgotten that too, A species of paralysis laid hold of her, leaving her for the time incapable of movement.

She heard the deep voice of this one who say: "Lots of time in life. There is only one law that I shall lay your life, and I should have stayed out. Don't worry. I've got everything mapped out. There's a train at mid-night."

Arthur stood up. "Mother, I am the guilty man. I was the thief. All these years I've let you believe that Paul was taking the money.

"Yes, yes!" she interrupted, never taking her eyes off this other son. "I heard everything behind these curtains. You were going away, Paul, without seeing me?"

"What was the use of stirring up old matters? Of bringing contention into this house?" He did not look at her. He could not tell her that he now knew what had drawn him hither, that all along he had deceived himself.

"Paul, my son, I have been a wicked woman."

"Why, mother, you mustn't talk like that!"

"Wicked! My son, my silent, kindly, chivalric boy, will you forgive your mother? Your dishonored mother?"

He caught her before her knees touched the floor, and all how bitterly her arms wound about him.

"What's the use of lying?" he cried brokenly. "My mother! I wanted to hear your voice and feel your arms

"Eighteen Thousand Miles I Have Traveled to Find You."

you don't know how I have always loved you. It was a long time, a very long time. Perhaps I was to be blamed. I was proud, and I got away from you. Don't cry. There, there! I can go away now, happy." Over his mother's shoulders, now moving with silent sobbing sobs, he held out his hand to his brother. Presently, above the two bowed heads, Warrington's own eyes transfigured with happiness.

The hall door opened and closed, but none of them regarded it.

Ay and by the mother stood away, but within arm's length. "How big and strong you have grown, Paul."

"In heart, too, mother," added Arthur. "Old Galahad!"

"You must never leave us again, Paul. Promise."

"May I always come back?"

"Always!" And she took his hand and pressed it tightly against her cheek. "Always! Ah, your poor thing mother!"

"Always to come back!"

"Come back! Why, in a little while, I take up the work I have always loved, the building of bridges."

"And I am going, too!" it was Elsa, at her journey's end.

Jealous love he knew of eye. There was death in Arthur's heart, but he smiled at her. After all, what was more logical than that she should appear at this moment? Why slip the ring when it might be drained at once, over with and done with?

"Elsa!" said the mother, holding Warrington's hand in closer grasp.

"Yes, mother. Ah, why did you not tell me all?"

Arthur walked to the long window that opened out upon the garden. There, for a moment, he paused, then passed from the room.

"Go to him, mother," said Elsa, wise by one week.

The mother hesitated, pulled by the old and the new love by the fear that the new-found could be hers but a little while. Slowly she let Paul's hand fall, and slower still she followed Arthur's footsteps.

"I won't quite brave enough," he said, when she found him. "They love. And love me well, mother, for I am broken and a thief."

She pressed his head against her heart. "My boy!" Her glance was leveled at the ambiguities window through which she had come.

To Warrington, Elsa was a little thinner, and of color there was none; but her eyes shone with all the splendor of the oriental stars at which he had so often gazed with mute inquiry.

"Untangle," she said, and smiled. "Well, what have you to say?"

"I to God's name, what can I say but that I love you?"

"Well, say it, and stop the ache in my heart! Say it, and make me forget the weary eighteen thousand miles I have journeyed to find you! Say it, and hold me close for I am tired!"

Listen! she whispered, lifting her head from his shoulder.

From out the stillness of the summer night came a jarring note, the eternal protest of Ralph.

THE END.

Gambling at Monte Carlo.

A Monte Carlo dispatch says gambling is rampant again after four and a half months of enforced inactivity. There is no gold or silver shining on the green cloth; very cheap have taken their places, but roulette and trente-et-quarante are going on at a few tables. The revival, however, has not sufficed to restore the season's usual animation to the town. The hotels are nearly empty.

Gotham—Hold his nose, I should say.

DIDN'T WANT TO MARRY A FAMILY

Young Woman Farmer Courted Said She Did Not Like Stepchildren.

IS ACCUSED OF CRIMES

Man Is Suspected of Killing His Son to Aid His Scheming—Rumors and Gossip Also Touch Other Incidents.

Topeka, Kan.—Did George Post, a farmer of McPherson county, deliberate to get rid of his only son so that he could offer his hand and heart and wealth, free and unencumbered, to a young woman neighbor? This is the theory upon which the prosecutor is working to clear up the mystery surrounding the murder of the boy, seventeen years old; the burning of an elegant home and possibly the murder of Mrs. Post within the last 18 months.

George Post is forty years old. Twenty years ago he was a poor boy in a central Kansas county. He was only reasonably successful in farming, had luck came to him in streaks. He accumulated some property, and some years ago, during one of his good luck periods, Post built a fine home for his wife and only son.

In January, 1914, Mrs. Post was killed. She was sitting at the breakfast table when a charge of shot struck her head. Post claimed that while his wife was in the kitchen he was cleaning a shotgun. He "didn't know it was loaded" and the gun was discharged.

No Action is Taken.

While there were rumors and gossip, no action was taken. A few weeks later it developed that there was sufficient insurance on the life of Mrs. Post to pay off a mortgage on the farm and buy some additional land.

One evening last autumn the fine new Post home caught fire. Post and his son worked hard to extinguish the blaze and relatively little from considerable distance and helped, but the home was destroyed. The fire was supposed to have been caused by an overheated stove. The insurance companies paid Post and he built a small cottage for himself and son and bought another farm.

On the evening of June 2 Post began calling up neighbors and asking

"Do I Know It Was Loaded," and the Gun Was Discharged.

if they had seen his seventeen-year-old son, Roy. All the neighbors turned out and began searching for the youth. Late that night his body was found in the Post barn. The boy had eaten supper and then went out to do some chores. When he did not return at bedtime his father said he had gone to a neighbor's home to call.

Killed With Gas Pipe.

The lad had been killed by a blow on the head with a piece of gas pipe. That had been in one his own pastents, who live a few hundred yards away, during the evening. There was no doubt that a murder had been committed, so the officers sent for bloodhounds. The animals followed a trail from the barn out through a potato patch and then to the Post home. Post had been kept inside his house until the dogs came up. When he came out his shoes were hanged at him. Then a pair of shoes Post had worn were found. They had been washed recently. The shoes fit the track the dogs had followed.

Then the officers discovered that George Post had been calling upon a young woman neighbor. This woman had told some of her girl friends that she "didn't want to marry a family." She wanted a family of her own, and not the children and daughters. This gave the officers a possible theory of the murder of the son, and they began the course to hold Post on a charge of murder.

USE SPARROWS TO TEASE STOREKEEPER

Patient Merchant, Victim of Youths' Pranks, Finally Rebels at Latest Trick.

Rochester, N. Y.—F. W. Huntington, who runs a notions and candy store at 249 Bay street, is a patient man, but when some boys in his neighborhood who have been annoying him let loose three sparrows in his store he felt his limit of endurance had been reached.

Mr. Huntington accused two boys, about fifteen or sixteen years old, as the leaders in devising tricks to plague him, although younger boys have also joined in the tricks. He had one of the sparrows, which he caught in the store, with him as evidence. It was in a pasteboard box, with a small hole cut in the top.

"I chased those birds all over the store," he said, "and you may believe it was a job to drive them out. They would fly everywhere except out of the door."

Telling derisively when customers were in the store, the sparrows made into the place and the operation of the police known as a third trick had had been tried by the ingenious youths before letting loose the sparrows.

BULL'S LOVE CAN'T BE COWED

Elopes With Maude Veal After Family Roasting, and Expects Boring Now.

Binghamton, N. Y.—Charles Bull and Miss Maude S. Veal were married here, which is nobody's business. Mr. Bull, who is not in the meat business, told Rev. H. S. Sweetland that he and his bride had traveled from Scranton to avoid any action by the Veal family, who opposed the match because of the bridegroom's name.

Mr. Bull explained that he and his bride had gone up with this opposition like lambs until they decided to elope for themselves and strike all on

LAST OF OLD SHIP

Once Famous Yankee Sea Fighter Is Sold as Junk.

Portsmouth, Ornament of American Navy in Its Bronze Up—Ended a Long and Glorious Fighting Career.

"Gallant Old Portsmouth Sold as Junk for $5,000."

This heading marked the inglorious end of one of the old and tried defenders of the Union.

Even as the mighty fighting ships of the Atlantic fleet swept down the Hudson, across the bay and out to sea a few weeks ago, the doom of the old sloop of war was announced in an advertisement that she would be sold to the highest bidder above $5,000, her appraised value.

The government had tried to save the Portsmouth from such a fate, but its efforts were unavailing. Secretary Daniels was willing to present her to any patriotic society that would take her and repair her, or to give her to the city of Portsmouth, N. H., after which she was named. But it would cost at least $25,000 to raise her from the mud of Norfolk navy yard and take her any distance and fit her out so as to make her presentable even as a relic.

Because she had taken an active part in the troubles on the Pacific coast that ever-ally brought California into the Union it was thought fitting by many that the sloop should be sent to San Francisco for the exposition. In August, 1911, a bill was introduced in congress to appropriate $25,000 to make her ready for the trip. The senate passed the bill, but the house rejected it.

She was launched in 1843, a sister ship to the St. Mary's. She was of three masts and carried 700 tons, with a draft of about seventeen feet. For many years she plowed the seas in all parts of the world, an active unit of the navy.

Her first service of note was during the war with Mexico, a few years after she was launched. Commodore John D. Montgomery in command, she took possession of the Bay of San Francisco and the adjoining territory, previously having sent the frigate ship Administrator, under charter to Mexico, and forcing her to strike her colors. Montgomery, Jones, Sloat and Stockton were all successive commanders of the Portsmouth. An apology was not forthcoming, and Commander Foote received permission to avenge the insult. He did so effectively, assisted by the Levant and the San Jacinto.

They attacked the four forts of Monterey, eight feet thick, mounting 176 guns and garrisoned by 3,000 men. After a fight lasting several days the four forts were captured. The American loss was 11 killed and 25 wounded, while 400 Chinese were killed.

Her last venture of note was during the Civil war. When the question arose of capturing New Orleans it was determined to have the wooden ships of the navy make a bold dash along the Mississippi, past Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and should they be successful, take the city, in which case the two forts, cut off from their base of supplies, would be compelled to surrender. By many the plan was considered foolhardy, but Admiral Farragut, determined to put it into execution.

It was dark when the order was given to start. The Portsmouth, the flagship of the mortar flotilla, soon found herself in the midst of a terrific storm; not she threw a line to a steamer, and swept up the river with the rest of the fleet.

SHOT CHILDREN IN DREAM

Texas Ranch Woman Finds Her Offspring Wounded When She Awakes.

San Antonio, Tex.—Mrs. W. H. Liberle, who resides on a ranch near Hedwig, Bexar county, was awakened one recent Sunday night when she was dreaming that a burglar was trying to break into her home.

A bullet from an automatic revolver went off each of her children, one in the right leg, another only flesh wounds.

Some of the unusual incident reached San Antonio relatives of Mrs. Liberle recently. According to their account Mrs. Liberle was so unnerved by the consequences of her vision she does not recall whether she dreamed the concern that had been sleeping beside her were burglars and had aimed at them, or whether she was talking about the room and dropped the revolver, causing it to be discharged.

BOY TRIES TO RIVAL BIRDS

Indiana Youth Breaks His Arm in Glide From Barn Loft on Wings.

Evansville, Ind.—John Mitchell, aged fourteen, living in the Mount Pleasant section, had a dream of soaring to rival the birds and came to earth with a broken arm. He made a glider and wings after a pattern in a boy's book which he bought at a local store.

He attempted to glide from the loft of his stable to the ground. The gliders were not strong and the wings collapsed. Mitchell fell to the ground and his left arm was broken near the elbow and he suffered slight internal injuries.

Old Mark's Stratagem

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1915, by W. G. Chapman.)

"And I wish you joy of them," repeated Mrs. Philip Adams, pursing her lips and looking sagrily at Lucy Smith.

It had always irritated the wealthy farmer's wife that her cousin, the only child of wealthy uncle Frank Smith, should have offered a home to their mutual uncle, Mark Evans.

Mark Evans had proved a prosper ous farm of his own a few years before, but when his sire died the old man of eighty was unable to keep it up. At eighty-two his niece, Mrs. Adams, fearing that the property would leave her only a trivial legacy, persuaded the old man to sell out.

"Pay the money over to me and Phil," she said, "and we will take care of you."

"Look!" cried the boy. He was pointing to a young man leaving an employees' time clock, which the young man had just punched.

"Well, naw," continued Willie, "I want to see what he wins!"

Unexpected Chicken.

A stranger, arriving in a small town, hailed a passing resident and inquired:

"Can you direct me to a place where they take boarders?"

"Pair middle!" said the boy. "Have chicken very often for dinner?"

"Reg'lar and unexpected."

"Unexpected? You mean by regular and unexpected?"

"They have chicken reg'lar every Sunday."

"I see—"

"Say, you have been hit when an automobile unexpectedly kills one in the road."—Judge.

Wearisome Propositions.

"Well, Miranda," said Mrs. Bosbyshull to her cook, "I hear it rumored that you are going to be married again, this time to Joe."

"Yo'm, I ain't gwine get married again. Mine ah done" replied Miranda. "I'm very fond o' Joe, but I ain't gwine to marry him.

"What's the trouble?" asked Mrs. Bosbyshull.

"Ah," no trouble, Miss Lucy," said Miranda, "but Joe done asked me ten times in ten different times already, an' tell yo' de truth I'm gittin' mighty tired o' turnin' down so many good offers."

His Bid.

Between the blonde young woman on the other side of the car and her stout neighbor next to the left there was evidently a space perhaps four inches in width. Clinging to the strap just in front of the blonde woman was a cheerful individual whose uncertain footing was it seemed, not wholly due to the jolting and jerking of the common carrier. Presently he fastened an ingratiating smile upon the young woman.

"Madam," murmured he, "if you'd lemme sit down in that place there you'd do me a kind and a charitable act."

"Perfect Example.

"The paper speaks of a certain argument as being decidedly yet forcefully phrased," said the young student. "What would be a good example of it?"

"My son," returned the father, "can it be that you have never lent ear to your mother's able representations on the periodical occasions when I return home on pay day?"

The identity of the favorite son is established beyond doubt every time a will is offered for probate.

Canada is finding a wide market abroad for baled hay.

"But I Don't Play No Favorites," He Said.

pay her courtin a visit. "Eats his head off, don't he?"

"Yes, he's a good appetite," admitted Lucy. "We like to see uncle eat."

"Humph! Well, it's more than I do," answered her cousin. "And don't you think we're going to take him back after he's been good and spoiled to us, because we ain't."

"Frank said I have offered Uncle Mark a home for the rest of his days," answered Lucy quietly.

That was then, and the old man was welcome. No longer living upon grudging charity he lent a hand at the farm. Willie was a little bigger and stronger than the feet they are to clothe, with wide toes, flexible soles and low heels.

The matter of shape disposed of, without room for mistake, there is left a considerable latitude in choice of design and finish. All on the same sensible last, plain, dressy and fancy shoes have received almost as much attention as the hands of manufacturers can bestow. Some older people and this is saying a lot.

An attractive dress shoe for a child is shown in the picture, with white kid and patent leather combined in the good model design. It fastens over the instep and ankles with cutout straps ornamented over black buttons at the side. The neat machine stitching is an important feature of the finish. A flat ribbon bow decorates the toe.

For the wellgrown man a pretty shoe is shown with cloth top, patent leather trimming and laced latchings.

For the Dancing Class.

A frock which would be useful for dancing classes or for evening parties were is carried out in soft white washable silk, with a skirt of novel design, full gathered with a double row of ravaging at the back and sides, but flattened in front with a plain flat panel. A broad sash of rose colored satin crosses the waist while the bodice is very becomingly gauged round the shoulders and arranged with a net yoke. Rose colored silk flash, gathered rated with solid borders in set figures or are gay with painted flowers. One of these is novelty having a small pin carrier at the base of the stick, just large enough to hold dimes. Prices as they are, none of these hats are expensive unless one chooses those with giant sticks or having much curling.

Among the very cheap fans, such as sell for twenty-five cents or not more than fifty, the Japanese designs offer really good materials and ingenious surfaces. They are well made and narrow than usual. They are often fine examples of Japanese art.

Knitted Silk Sports Coats.

Knitted silk sports coats are not sweaters. True, they can be used for many of the purposes for which a sweater is used, but there is quite a difference in the garments. Various kinds of knitted silk fabrics are used for the purpose, but, unlike the sweater, they are lined, and sometimes with a silk strongly contrasting with the outer material. Not infrequently this silk runs over into cuffs and collar. The coats are made along loose lines, sometimes belted or sashed. Semi-fortfolk jackets of knitted silk are very fetching and among the most popular coats in the knitted silk fabrics.

Braid in Millinery.

Serviceable, adaptable braid has been called upon for trimming the newest tailored hats, and some very unique effects have been obtained with complete success. A large close rose of tinted white silk braid effectively trims a fine white leghorn, a three-towered dark brown indian hat displays at one side a full spray of silk braids braid alluring enough to tempt any modern daughter of Eve. Wide cotton braid with tinted borders and the sports hats of panama, milan and peanut straw. Watch braid counters for choice bits if you wish a new hat trimming.

Concreting Man Who Loved

He Showed Affection for Everybody and Everything Except Neighbor on Party Telephone Line.

There was once a man who tried to love his neighbors. He began with those next door and succeeded in loving them very satisfactorily, although one of them kept chickens and the other was a rival and perhaps superior gardener. From these concrete examples he proceeded to demonstrate his ability to love the abstract variety of neighbors which includes everybody and everything. He not only loved his neighbors' chickens, but inlored his neighbors' gardens—even the arrogant tomatoes that bloomed and flowered there with their little brown garden plots away. He loved the lawman and the light and gas and water men, and he would have loved the man who cleaned the streets if he had been certain of his existence.

He loved the gentleman across the street who tinkered with the street car all day long, and he loved the woodpecker that hammered the water spout outside his bedroom window at five o'clock each morning. He loved the telephone exchange, although they pulled his pansies, and he pretended that he loved the beetles that fed on the hearts of his cucumbers. He loved his weather and cold weather, and expressed a peculiar affection for the weather man.

All things he loved, and many more, but there was one neighbor that he could not love. It was the neighbor who was said to be on the same party telephone line with him. It is doubtful if anybody has ever concreted a man, but the evidence, even present, somebody who seems to live on his party line. It has long been a matter of regret that one half of the world did not know how the other half lived. By means of the party line we have found out all about it, and a very unpleasant bit piece of knowledge it has been. We know too much about the neighbors on our party line, and we know too much about us.

The man might have succeeded in loving his neighbor on his telephone line if he had met him over the garden fence, but they were forever assaulting each other with unexpected and terrible shrillness, and with unwelcome requests from each to the other to "get off the line." When he called up his wife in the morning his neighbor's wife answered him, and when he tumbled down the stairs to answer his telephone in the night, the neighbor ran down back to bed humiliated. And then his wife and the neighbor's wife met at a quilting where the latter induced the former to listen to a weary recital of the telephone habits of the neighbor on the party line." Of course there was no chance after that. Concreting was impossible. The party telephone lines connect us too closely with our neighbors to permit us to love each other.

The Berry Par Excellance.

After the wild strawberry has been laid up as the strawberry par excellence for generations, the New York Independent comes along and says it is a mistake. It is pure imagination, the article says, that wild strawberries were at any time better than cultivated sort.

That assertion may pass unnoticed by the man who has lived all his life on paved streets. But ask the man who, as a boy, went out in the early days of summer to pick berries and gorge while hunting for wild strawberries. Wild strawberries! When memories of the heart's Wild Strawberries! Was there ever a strawberry, barbecue or truck garden variety, that could compare in sweetness or flavor to the strawberry of the boyhood days and field? Granting that sidelime memories are faintly, ask the country boy of today. The verdict of the Independent is covered on appeal to the great American tribunal of boyhood. Nothing on this earth like the wild strawberry. It is still the party par excellence.—Kansas City Times.

Concrete for Churches.

Reinforced concrete is often used in manufacturing in church construction and in some parts of Europe there are many churches which have been recently erected, such as the cathedral of Piat in Russia. Another one is for holding twenty-one thousand, and for completed the unfinished church. In Japan there is a church remaining for a long time without towers or belfries, and these are built at a later date. In order not to add an unduly heavy load on the already existing foundations, reinforced concrete has an advantage over stonework, and is lighter, less expensive. A proof example is formed in the cathedral of Tokio, which was recently completed by starting on two high buttress in reinforced concrete, and these make up a good architectural ensemble with the former stone work.—Scientific American.

This Deer Is a Trusty.

Mrs. Ada Kirkpatrick of Mission Canyon, Cal., has a deer that refuses to yield to the call of the wild. For three years Mrs. Kirkpatrick has kept the deer on her ranch. Each night she has had the deer shut in a smaller inclosure to safeguard the nimble creature from harm.

Recently the deer disappeared for the wild life the owner opened the gates leading into the mountains. The deer was off like a bullet. Before darkness came the deer was found pawing at the inclosure gate.

Each night now for some time the deer has returned to be locked up after roaming all day over the mountain range. Despite its freedom the creature continues to be tame, and comes when its owner calls.

Some Family Tree.

Sir Wakkin Williams Wynne, talking to a friend about the antiquity of his family was told roughly that he was a mere mushroom. "How is that?" he asked indignantly. "Why," said the other, "when I was in Wales, a pedigree of a particular family was shown to me which filled more than five large parchment skins, and near the middle of it was a note in the margin: 'About this time the world was created.'"

Permanent Styles in Fans

There is nothing very new to report in fans, and there hardly need be, for the flowers, they suit as as they are. They are modern or small in size and composed of the fragile and fair material we are used to. Silk gauze or lace or both combined make airy backgrounds for flowers painted in feathers and wreaths in miniature, but perfect art. Sometimes thicker than stars in the sky, snakes over all. They were never so literally used.

Ivory, mother of pearl or wood, with much carving and picking out in gold or silver paint, tone the sticks. Even in the least expensive fans there is an unusual amount of beautiful decoration. The imitation ivory sticks are quite as beautifully backed and the artificial material is so close to tell the difference.

Fans of white gauze with medallions and borders of crimson lace braid and thickly spangled with tiny silver sequins have proved their captivating qualities by heading the list of "best sellers." In the month of roses, when graduates and brides must be remembered, this is the fan that is scattered to all the points of the compass. Fans of black gauze with many spangles put on in a set design and scattered over rose surface besides have proved an alluring or over.

Small colloidal fans that may be carried in the handbag are decorated with gold borders in set figures or are gay with painted flowers. One of these is novelty having a small pin carrier at the base of the stick, just large enough to hold dimes. Prices as they are, none of these hats are expensive unless one chooses those with giant sticks or having much curling.

About Shoes for the Young People

Following in the shoe tracks of their fathers and mothers, the young people are wearing the best-looking and best-made shoes which have fallen to their lot so far. The correct styles for children as to shape are those that allow the shape of the foot, snug enough not to slip at the heel, and a little longer and broader than the feet they are to clothe, with wide toes, flexible soles and low heels.

"Fussy" I have offered Uncle Mark a home for the rest of his days," answered Lucy quietly.

"But I don't play no favorites," he said. "You and Jane is welcome to lay my guests whenever you want to—only, of course, seeing as I gave you my other time to Jane, I'm Lucy's."

His Jaw a Pile.

Some marvelous surgical operations have been performed in the Sheffield hospital, but none more so than the one in which the surgeon made a new jaw, giving him no speech making to the world of surgery. The operation was carefully executed at the American Ambulance (military hospital), Paris.

A soldier was brought in with the right half of his lower jaw shot away. The bones of the teeth were taken from another man badly wounded in the same fight and the pieces fitted together to the head of the first soldier in the place of his missing jaw. The operation was entirely successful.

One Monogram Lost to Literature.

"The other day," said Harry M. Aull, Chiggerville's popular undertaker, "I set down to write a monogram on the Fullitty or Everything. It was a great thought—it thrilled me. But mine is a sterely logical mind. The more the truth of my great theme came home to me, the more clear it became that I would have to give up writing the monogram. For nothing else is fullin."—Kansas City Star.

KING SERVES AS UNDEROFFICER

Italian Monarch Takes Orders From General Cadorna.

SHARES PERILS OF TROOPS

His Indifference to Danger Admiration of Men, but Source of Anxiety to Commanders—Where in Midst of Troops, Incognito, Forerunner of Other Projectiles, Passes Over His Head.

Paris.—The telegram saying that King of Italy had been made a corporal in the United ranks of the French army, which appeared in Paris in May, the time correspondent of Le Temps relates, all the greater, as Victor Emmanuel III. is rapidly gaining on the hold of battle the same popularity as his grandfather, who was always proud of having been named "corporal" after the victory of Palestro.

Although the Italian constitution gives the king the right of peace and war and the command in war of a land and sea force, Victor Emmanuel has insisted on acting as a simple general, taking orders from the generals in line.

During his conversation recently with Peppino Garibaldi he spoke chiefly about Joffre and his generals. Interwhile he waited for over an hour in the gardens of Villa Ada with Gabriele d'Annunzio, he asked him everything about the French army, which the poet could tell him. He never asked, therefore, he could have sketched the part of generalissimo, he has gone to the other extreme and has given each his opinion unless he is pressed to do so by the generalissimo himself.

"The head of the army is General Cadorna. I am only one of the officers in the service of Italy," he can only the king's words, but they express an actual situation.

The other day the soldiers fighting on the banks of the Isonzo were startled a telegram which said that the king had shared a dangerous march with the infantry and had descended with his own hand a corpsmen and two patrons who had accomplished feats in his presence. The men, believing the king still in the Trentino, were enraged at the idea that he had been in battle with them, when a cry arose, "Viva il Re!"

And cries of "Long live the king!" spread more as the moments, in gray green uniform, without any stripes, appeared on a bridge. The enthusiasm was "the spontaneous cry of a royal visitor so thickly that his horse could not go."

"What do they want, those brave fellows?" asked the king to his aid. "Do they expect me to cry 'Long live the king!' as well? That would be too much."

Then raising his cap in the air he shouted, "Long live the soldiers of Italy!"

This brought more cheering and more crowds to cheer, until the officers had to shout, "Long live the ranks to give the king room to move."

And off he went to another point of the trenches. To avoid indifference to danger is the admiration of the troops, but a source of anxiety to the generalissimo.

The other day, for example, the king was in the midst of the trenches when a shrapnel shell passed over his head, the precursor of further projectiles in the same kind. According to the regulations, every man should throw himself flat to give the least possible mark for the bursting fragments. The king seemed to hesitate, but a private near him took him by the shoulder and made him bend down.

Just then the dust thrown up by the shell fell on the line and covered him. The king raised his head, took up a little of the earth that had fallen on him and said, "It is a good omen."

General Cadorna, however, or this occasion was almost angry. He did not, as has been reported, put his king under arrest but he begged him to remain for at least five days at a certain distance from the front. The king gaily replied, "I obey."

ANCIENT ORDER OF GLEANERS

The Gleaners of Charlevoix county are planning a grand rally to be held at Boyne City on September 23. Mr. and Mrs. Fred R. Marvin, Federation Supervisor and assistant respectively, of Detroit, have held a series of Local Arbor meetings the past two weeks, at Hallock, Elmira, Boyne Falls, Springvale, Walloon Lake, Bear Creek, Bay Shore, Norwood, Quality, Ironton, Ellsworth, and Central Lake.

Speaking before the Gleaners of Charlevoix, Monday, Mr. Marvin said, in part: "While Michigan is the home state of the Gleaner order, I find that the people of the state have a very limited knowledge of our great agricultural society, in Michigan alone numbering 66,000 members. There is no other association of farmers like it in the world. Not only educational, it has a fraternal and industrial side. During the past few years the Gleaners have distributed among their own people over three million dollars in hard cash, and in caring for the physical wants and needs of over seven thousand persons.

"The cooperative features of the order have been over-estimated and over-drawn in the imagination of many well-meaning people. The truth is, Michigan Gleaners do not advocate nor encourage farmers to enter the general retail store business, but to promote and encourage the erecting and operating of farmer elevators and warehouses by and for farmers, as a solution of the marketing problem.

"There is nothing unfair nor unreasonable about Gleaner co-operation, which would place the business end of farming in the control of the farmers who produce for sale the nation's foodstuffs. As a natural result of the Gleaner campaign for control of agricultural markets, Michigan farmers are erecting elevators and warehouses in all parts of the state.

DIAZ n'est pas MORTE.

DEAR EDITOR:

The Sentinel in its last issue printed an obituary under the heading, "Diaz est morte." He is not "morte," he is still not dead; some but females ran to "morte." He would resent the insinuation that he was a female. The article in French agrees with the substantial in gender as well as in number. The masculine form is "mort," so that to speak correctly one should say Diaz est mort.

Petoskey News: David R. Jones, who has just arrived home from a trip to Duluth, reports he has secured the appointment to the position as special assistant to the state game, fish and forestry warden and that he has commenced work under the new title. The salary is fixed at $1,800 per year, the same amount he was receiving as chief deputy before the change was made. Mr. Jones also reports that the state fire patrol boat, which was towed to Duluth from Isle Royal for repairs was overhauled in just three hours by a marine engine expert and has just completed the trip from Duluth to Harbor Springs. The state patrol engine, which was thought to have passed its days of usefulness is now running in fine shape.

Petoskey News: Manager Williams, of the telephone company, here in Petoskey, has a plan for marking the birthplace of Rex Beach, the author, who was born and reared on a farm not far from Norwood, in the southwest corner of Charlevoix county. The old farm on which this well-known writer spent his boyhood days is on the main line of the West Michigan pike, and Mr. Williams believes it might prove an interesting thing if a huge boulder was placed beside the road and a suitable bronze tablet placed on it. The old farm house is situated on a large crossroad about little distance from the main road but be plainly seen as one passes the place. Of all the writers who have spent their early life in Northern Michigan, Rex Beach is probably the best known at this time and we believe the marking of his old home as suggested by Mr. Williams will meet with considerable enthusiastic favor with admirers. Mr. Williams believes a fund could be raised by popular subscription and the cost of the tablet and stone be made under the auspices of the West Michigan Pike association.

Play Your Own Hand.

In this land of opportunity you are cautioned against merely remaining a good chance and stopping there. Dreaming that there is money in something doesn't get the money out. Neither is the plan of playing one man's capital against that of another follow the best way to get the green stuff. You must invest your energy as well as money in order to make it come.—Lake Linden Times.

Community Directed by Women.

In Switzerland a community is directed by women, not by chance, but by custom and necessity. This is the rocky island of Ushaut, dreaded by sailors, which breeds a hardy race of seamen engaged either in the French navy or mercantile marine or in fishing, the work on land being done by the women.

Stops Wind His Watch.

A Californian is the owner of what is said to be the only watch of the kind in the world in which a lever oscillates and winds the spring with every step that he takes.

Estimating Oneself.

The proper way to make an estimate of ourselves is to consider certainly what we value or despise in others.

CONSERVATORY PLAYERS

Says They Struck Twelve Every Place He Heard Them.

The noted Chautauqua and lyceum lecturer, H. W. Sears, familiarly termed "Taffy" Sears by the Chautauqua fraternity, hands the following statement the other day concerning the Conservatory Players, who will appear afternoon and night on the opening day of the Charlevoix Chautauqua:

"I had the very great pleasure of hearing the Conservatory Players for ten days in Pensylvania this winter, and to say they pleased their audiences does not begin to express it. They struck twelve everywhere I heard them. I never met a more refined and a more genial bunch in my life. They gave a sketch that surpasses anything I have ever seen or heard on the chautauqua platform. They will please any audience anywhere in the United States. They are perfect ladies and gentlemen and they will please you."

The Conservatory Players will appear in Musical Entertainment afternoon and night on the opening day of the Chautauqua.

"A MODERN CINDERELLA"

Among the principal attractions which Manager Bridge at the Charlevoix Theatre has booked for this season is "A Modern Cinderella" which will be played here on August 5th. This is a unique and fascinating musical comedy well sprinkled with nifty choruspirls, founded upon the old, old story or fable of Cinderella and the crystal slipper. Modernized and brought up to date by introducing characters, scenes and happenings of every day life.

The music is said to be "whistlable" which means that it leaves you humming and thinking it for weeks after witnessing the performance. The book and lyrics are both funny and interesting, in fact old fashioned like it is well that it stayed for nearly a year in the big city opposite Brooklyn. This in itself should be sufficient proof to local patrons that in "A Modern Cinderella" they will get more than their money's worth.

The Western Michigan Development Bureau wishes to save as many Western Michigan apple growers as possible to take part in the international apple shippers' Association apple show at Hotel Sherman, Chicago, August 4th, 5th and 6th. The association will take charge of all exhibits, so that the growers will receive valuable advertising without cost to them. Circulars and entry blanks, giving full particulars as to rules, classes and prizes, will be furnished on application. The question of maturity has nothing to do with the exhibit. The time to pick apples here the crop has progressed up into August 1, and an immature apple has just as good a chance as one that is matured, provided it is up to the standard for its particular section or state at that season of the year.

A novelty, a real one, is always appreciated no matter what it is, but when a theatrical producer gets a novelty, he is usually appreciative for he knows he has something that will make pots of money and for the present at least he need look worry. This was never more emphatically proven than in "A MODERN CINDERELLA" which comes to the Charlevoix Theatre on August 5th.

THE EASTLAND HORROR

Steamer Eastland Turns Turtle in Chicago River—Twelve Hundred People Drowned.

The steamer Eastland, with more than 2,400 excursionists on board bound for Fenton Harbor, capsized at her dock near Clark street bridge, last Saturday morning. Of the 2,400 men, women and children on board 1,200 were drowned in the muddy, putrid waters of Chicago river. Over 500 bodies have been recovered.

Of course, following a disaster of this magnitude, there are all kinds of theories as to the cause, and an excited public always seeks a scapegoat. The Eastland was what a senior calls "cranky." She was fitted with water ballast tanks, which were emptied upon starting from her moorings. Upon an excursion today. Telephone No. 120 or call at our back door and our clerk will answer your questions.

There has been 400,000,000,000 flies swatted the last year by actual count. One fly killed in early summer means several thousand less in the fall. Keep swatting. Every fly swatted confers a blessing upon humanity. Swat.

THE U. S. NAVY OF 1915.

The pomp and panoply of naval life have been told at various times in brilliant creations in pen and pencil by Dogtown, Heuterdahl, Lenz and others. They have been admirably expressed in song and story by Kipling, but it has remained for Lyman H. Howe to depict navy life in the most novel of all agencies — the motion picture, and Howe is indebted to Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, for the authority and facilities that made possible such a reproduction as will be seen at the Majestic Theatre, on Aug. 10th. The nation-wide prestige and popularity of Mr. Howe's exhibition, and its mighty influence, induced Secretary Daniels to confer this signal honor upon Mr. Howe. On several occasions high Government officials, recognizing the educational value of this exhibition, have granted special permits to Mr. Howe to film events of national interest. But in order to insure the most notable reproductions of naval life ever photographed, the Secretary of the Navy has for two years, through the commanders and officers of the fleet, extended Mr. Howe the most hearty co-operation and has been imparting to him special facilities. As may be expected, this has resulted in the first and only film reproduction that reveals the efficiency of men, guns and machinery of our new dreadnaught and super-dreadnaughts, as well as all activities, sports, pastimes, games, drills and daily duties aboard ship.

"Immense! I congratulate you," said Rear-Admiral Badger upon viewing the remarkable reproduction. What appealed so strongly to him was not alone the spectacular phase of the series but also the thoroughness that characterized the work of the camera men in filming the numerous and manifold duties on board ship.

THE PRESIDENT'S ULTIMATUM.

From time immemorial international diplomacy was merely a school for informational treachery and deceit; assurances of "distinguished consideration" characterized all "notes" and purposes. An "unfriendly act," so termed in diplomatic correspondence, had but one meaning, and that was war.

The government of the United States, in the days of John Hay and Elihu Root, inaugurated a new school of diplomacy, in which frankness, sincerity and National self-respect dominated all intercourse with foreign nations. Since the days of James G. Blaine there has been but one discernible chapter in the history of American diplomacy, and that was during the period when W. J. Bryan rattled around in the sanctum sanctorum of the department of state.

In the present unpleasantness with Germany the course of the president has been loyally supported by the American people. National self-respect, courage and sincerity have been personified in the person of Woodrow Wilson, president of the United States.

There has the president been not "firm" the German government that he would be held "strictly responsible" for violations of recognized international law involving American interests—especially the loss of American lives. The last note delivered to Germany courageously re-affirms the rights of American citizens upon the high seas, and says:

"The government of the United States will continue to contend for that principle, from whatever quarter violated, without compromise, and at any cost."

This has the right American ring. It is the voice of the American people expressed through the chief executive. It demands immediate abandonment of Teutonic piracy and brigandage on the high sea, and the recognition of American rights under the protocols of international law. The "unfriendly act" clause of the president's note must make it clear to the Kaiser that the government of the United States will brook no further ambiguity or subterfuge. The president says:

"Friendship itself prompts it to say to the Imperial government that repetition by the commanders of German naval vessels of acts in contravention of those rights must be regarded by the government of the United States when they affect American citizens as deliberately unfriendly."

Whatever the outcome, the people are behind the president, whom borden the heaviest burns by any president since Lincoln.

Charlevoix, $46,260.

The apportionment of primary school money is based upon the number of the population of school age.

SUICIDE OF JOSEPH EMPEY.

The community was shocked Sunday when the news came that Joseph Empey, of East Jordan, had shot himself through the head at his home.

Mr. Empey was a prominent business man of East Jordan, and was in partnership with his brother, Fletcher F. Empey, in the furniture business.

He had been ill and very despondent for some time, and this is supposed to have been the cause of his act.

COME TO CHARLEVOIX NEXT YEAR

Mr. Butler succeeded in landing the 1916 convention for Charlevoix.

THE ROCK PRODUCT CO.

Expansion and Activity the Order of the Day Out at the Plant

It is a busy place out at the plant of the Rock Product Co. these days. There are six big cylindrical structures towering above the big building. They are the open-mouth time kilns. Four of them are doing business, and the other two, in process of construction, will add to the output next month.

Five carloads of lime leave the plant every day. As we left the plant Monday p. m. an engine was shoving in the five that were shipped on Tuesday. A half mile of narrow gauge track has lately been laid to reach more distant parts of the premises, and to augment facilities for handling kiln wood and raw material from the quarry.

Another section of track will soon be laid in front of the kilns, and a conveyor will be installed to carry the rock to the kiln. This improvement will greatly reduce the expense of supplying the kilns with rock. The cyclopean shovel is now there in the quarry pit tearing out the rock for the crusher. The crusher and machine is temporarily receiving repairs, but in a few days shipments of the various grades of crushed stone will begin to move, and seven carloads of this commodity will leave the plant daily.

The company is in excellent shape, and its future is encouraging from every point of view.

DAMNED IF THEY DO AND DAMNED IF THEY DON'T

We are told that a prominent official of some State automobile club was here last week making a note about certain arrests that have been made here for fast driving. We are also told that they were informed that Charlevoix proposed to enforce its ordinances, to say nothing of the State law.

The chief of police complains that he and his men are criticized for not making more arrests for various and divers offenses against the peace and quiet of the citizens.

Charlevoix is a resort town—the best in Michigan. It is not a Quaker settlement nor a Christian Endeavor symposium in session seven days in the week. Our intention is to give the local and general laws all the elasticity that they will bear, but—

The city of Charlevoix proposes to have its authority respected.

REV. QUINTON WALKER MARRIED

The TONQUA BEAN

By EDWARD ALBES of PAN AMERICAN UNION

THERE is a whimsy about the small cow-bean that appeals to humankind of high as well as low degree. It seems to persuade us forever to revert to the primitive and buy one for some wee offspring and bless our tastes may be commendable, and the fragrance of the fields gratifies the olfactory nerves of prince and pauper, of the ordinary mind and the poetic soul; but, whose more or less remote ancestors doubtless breathed in the perfume as it rose from the dew-covered, tender grass they moved with skinny blade and gathered in their cow-sized grins. The attraction of the perfume seems to have lingered even through many generations.

New-mown hay not being always available, and somewhat too bulky for aesthetic use even when it is, the art of the perfumer has been called upon to gratify the sense of smell with a fragrance that, however, so "new-mown hay" was added to the varied "perfumes of Arabby" mixed as toilet accessories in liquid form, and now "mildly" may inhale the delicious odor from her "" clean second bathe. She may, of course, be herself the dryly youth with big, bare arms swinging his gleaming scythe and enthroning the sweet young grass which she may fondly think is the source of the delicious essence she now inhales. But perfumes like many other things, are not always what they seem. Grass, freshly cut or otherwise, has had nothing to do with the production of the sweet-scented liquid labeled "new-mown hay." The source of the essence is really a bean. Not the common everyday commonplace, edible bean of our market gardens, but a bean that grows in that section of the world where once El Dorado, the "Gilded One," was thought to be its chiefest glorious glory, that fabled land to the fruitless quest of which so many darling, gold-loving adventurers spent money, time and even lives most lavishly. It is known as the Tonqua, Tonka, or Tonquin bean, said to be so called because it was erroneously thought to have been first introduced into Europe from the Chinese province of Tonquin. Wherever it got its name, the real source of the bean is to be found in the tropical countries of South America, chiefly in the valleys of the Orinoco, Caura, and Cuchivero rivers in Venezuela and in certain sections of Colombia.

The bean is the seed of Dipteryx odorata, a tree belonging to the leguminous or pulse family. The genus dipteryx comprises about eight species, all large trees, to be found in the forests of Brazil, the Guianas, Venezuela, Colombia, and tropical South America generally, having as representatives in northern localities. The tree grows from 60 to 80 feet high, with a trunk sometimes three feet in diameter. The iridescent pods are about two inches long, almond shaped, and very thick; the single seed is over an inch long and shaped somewhat like a large almond, but has a wrinkled skin of a shiny black color when ready for the market. The odor, which is remarkably strong, resembles that of sweet clover or new-mown hay, and is due to the presence of coumarin, a nonvolatile, crystalline, volatile, neutral substance, which is soluble in alcohol and ether and somewhat so in boiling water, from which it crystallizes on cooling. The beans are often frosted with crystals of this substance, which show distinctly on their black surface and give them the appearance of being sugar coated.

As stated, the tree is indigenous to tropical South America, but the section which produces the largest quantities and perhaps the best variety of the beans is the region between the Caura and Cuchivero rivers. The watershed between these two streams consists of several mountain ranges of granitic formation, the most considerable of which is the Sierra de la Mesa. On the right bank of the Caura river mountains of similar formation, of which Tumaga is the highest, also exist. The average altitude of these ranges is between 3,000 and 4,000 feet, although there are peaks rising to 6,000 feet. Some of the mountain ranges many isolated hills and large open masses of granite, only a little higher than the surrounding country, are scattered through the forest. The land in the vicinity of these mountains consists largely of granitic grit, and it is this soil that seems to be the most favorable for the growth of the tonqua-bean tree. The trees are not usually found in groves, but grow singly, though small clumps are occasionally found. The gathering of the nuts is thus all the more difficult and arduous. The wood of the tree is remarkably close-grained, very hard and heavy, and of a reddish color. In some respects the resemblance to mahogany is so frequently mistaken for it. It is highly prized as a cabinet wood. While cultivation of the tree has been attempted in Trinidad and other of the West Indies to a limited extent, the fact that it takes from fifteen to twelve years to come into bearing has discouraged any systematic efforts along this line, and the wild product is still depended upon to supply the market. Again the crops seem to be very irregular, and it is impossible to forecast the yield of any particular year. As a rule there is perhaps not more than one good crop in every three years, production in the intervals being so small that it hardly pays to collect the beans.

In Venezuela the tree is known as savragia, and the men engaged in the collection of the seeds or beans are called savragieros. Formerly, before the center of the tonqua-bean industry of Venezuela, and it is there that the savragieros market their product.

One factor which has much to do with certainty of the tonqua-bean crop is the presence of the tropical forests where the trees grow. Especially are the large trees with their very gaudily colored plumage and the many other varieties of the parrot family to be found in these regions an abomination in the eyes of the savragieros. They feed on the small immature fruit of the trees in the months of October and November, and, unless the beans are ready to be gathered, and often, alas, before, the ripe beans are gathered, and often flocks of these destructive birds may be seen wherever a large tonqua-bean tree is in fruit. According to Dunne Andre, the English naturalist, no birds are more extravagant than parrots in their method of feeding, not so much on account of what they consume as of what they destroy. Wherever these birds have eaten the ground is strewn with fruit only cleaved and then awkwardly dropped, or perhaps with just a small piece bitten off, hence the destruction before maturity of enormous quantities of the valuable beans.

In Andre's account of the industry in "A Naturalist in the Guianas" he states that it is usual about the beginning of February that the savragieros begin to organize their expeditions to the interior to collect the beans. For two or three months thereafter the Caura river presents a scene of animation. Boats of every size and description may be seen making their slow progress up the strong current of the river. Here still be even a large bonco, or dugout canoe of several tons capacity, carrying an entire family of the natives and laden with people one for a stay of several weeks. Again small skiffs, just large enough for one two hard-working paddlers and their outfit may be seen poking somewhat better reserves. Occasionally a flotilla of several boats carrying a larger expedition, consisting of 15 to 20 men, is met with. Progress up the river is slow and frequent stops at the settlements along the banks are made for the purpose of taking in fresh supplies of cassava, and having a good time. Many of the savragieros are old hands at the business and usually stop at the places leading to the savragieros with which they are familiar. They know every inch of the ground and every tonqua-bean tree in the district. Cano Guayapo, Suapure, Tembledor, and La Pisano are the names of some of the settlements where most of the boats stop. A few of the more energetic savragieros push on further to Canarejo, but it is hard work getting through the rapids of Mura and Pirito.

As soon as a party has selected a spot as a center of operations, the much build the rancho or hut which are to be their home for perhaps two or three months. If the fruit is sufficiently ripe and has commenced to fall, they begin gathering at once. Otherwise they spend the intervening time in locating the best trees and in hunting and fishing. When the fruit begins to fall, everyone goes busy. Men, women, and children, even down to the babes in arms, in daybreak the workers scatter through the forest and the work of gathering is overdoned. After all the fruit of the trees near to the ranchos has been gathered the men go farther into the forest, sometimes taking tapiras with them and remaining absent for a week or two. During this time they sleep in the forest in their hammocks, using plantain leaves or palm branches as a covering to keep dry when it rains.

The fruit of the tonqua-bean tree, or savragia, resembles a mango in appearance, but has little pulp, which is rather sticky and tasteless but is edible, and the seed is covered with a hard furr substance. After a sufficient quantity of the fruit has been gathered the savragieros takes the lot to some open place where he can get the benefit of sunshine and wind. The hard shell is carefully crushed between two stones, and a single chinse bean of dark-brown color is obtained. After a heap of these has been secured they are spread out on the large open masses of granite called lajas, which form a peculiar feature of the forests of this region. When dried, these are the tonqua beans of commerce as they are sold to the merchants and exporters in Ciudad Bolivar. By the end of May or the first part of June the crop is about exhausted and the Caura river again becomes alive with the returning boats. From the Caura they go into the Orinoco and thence down to Ciudad Bolivar, where the savragieros sell their accumulations of beans to the large exporting houses.

Before the tonqua beans are exported they go through a process of crystallizing by being stewed in strong rum or alcohol. Casks open at one end are placed in rows and filled to within about a foot of the top with the beans. The rum is then poured in until the casks is full. The beans are covered by layers of bagging or gunny sacks. At the end of 15 days the rum that has not been absorbed is drawn off and the beans taken out and spread out to dry in a current of air. When first taken out the beans are of a dull black color and are soft and swollen with the absorbed fluid. On drying slowly white crystals appear on the surface of the beans, which gives them the sugar-coated appearance they have when they arrive at their final destination in Europe or the United States. In the drying process they shrink considerably, and this gives them the wrinkled appearance so well known in wine casks or rum puncheons to the markets of the world.

As indicated heretofore the value of the bean lies in its aromatic properties, and the active principle is much used by the manufacturer of perfumes as a basis. While the odor is really that of sweet clover or freshly cut grass, it resembles that of the vanilla bean so closely that the tonqua bean has been used as an adulterant in the cheaper grades of vanilla extracts. Once upon a time, when sugar was a comparative rare article, it was the habit of taking a pinch of snuff to titillate their olfactories to the unending point the beau was in those days. Every jar of snuff on the shelves of the nobility contained several of these sweet-smelling beans. Even in the gold or silver pocket snuffboxes carried by our grandfathers a single bean was usually found to add its fragrance to the pungent powder which gave them such delight. Later the beans were used in pulverized form as a snuff or nasal aroma to smoking tobacco, one use to which they are still sometimes put. A powdered substite has been found, however, in the so called "wild vanilla," found in Florida, and the ordinary grade of smoking tobacco knows not the fragrance of the tonqua bean.

The price of the beans varies greatly and depends largely upon whether there is a good or poor crop. The crop of 1913 was very short and the price rose to $4.85 per pound. According to the commercial statistics of the United States importations during the year ending June 30, 1913, amounted to 76,353 pounds, valued at $1,140,469. These figures are some evidence that the scent of "new-mown hay" is still quite popular in the United States, for the scent is about all there is to the tonqua bean. It lends its fragrance to the tobacco for the smoker, to fine toilet soaps, to perfumery, and other dressings and does so largely accounts that softly tint the cheeks and lips of beauty, to flavoring extracts used in confections and ice creams, and to many other things that gratify the sense of smell. This has an agreeable odor become an important commercial commodity.

SOME ADVENTURE FOR BOSTON MAN

Thrilling Incident in Dark Alleyway in Which Back Bay Doctor Stars.

PUTS UP A BOLD FRONT

Tells Wife Harrowing Tale of Narrow Escape From Band of Cutthroats and—But Hear the Verdict of Doctor Story.

Boston—A prominent Back Bay physician—and to spare his blushes the police refuse to give his name, says the Boston American—returned home the other evening and exclaimed to his wife:

"My dear, I've had a narrow escape." Whereupon he proceeded to tell this story:

"As I came through Franklin avenue, between Court street and Court hill, I heard steps behind me. Remembering the number of recent hold ups I was alarmed and accelerated my pace. The man behind me also hurried.

"I came to a small alleyway and turned off, hoping he would pass by. Instead, to my horror, he turned in after me and hurried rapidly past me.

And He Got the Watch.

"Instantly I felt for my watch. I assure you, my dear, it was good! Imagine my consternation.

"I took courage, seized my assailant, and cried: 'Sir, give me that watch.'

"Perhaps he was frightened at so bold front, for without a word he handed it to me, and took to his heels.

"But," protested his puzzled wife, "You didn't have your watch with you. You left it on the bureau upstairs."

"Bless my soul," exclaimed the doctor. He examined the watch the man had handed him, found it was not his own, and in the utmost chagrin told the police. By a photograph the police located the owner, and the doctor met his victim.

"I thought you'd rob me," the doctor explained.

"And I thought you were a holdup man," the victim admitted.

The police absolutely vouch for this. It actually happened.

Without a Word He Drew the Watch From His Pocket.

The Effects of Opiates.

THAT INFANTS are peculiarly susceptible to opium and its various preparations, all of which are narcotics, is well known. Even in the smallest doses, if continued, these opiates cause changes in the functions and growth of the cells which are likely to become permanent, causing imbecility, mental perversion, a craving for alcohol or narcotics in later life. Nervous diseases, such as intractable insomnia, dyspepsia and lack of waking powers are a result of dosing with opiates or narcotics to keep children quiet in their infancy. The mothers who have taken these drugs themselves should never receive opiates in the smallest doses for more than a day at a time, and only then if unavoidable.

The administration of Anodynes, Drops, Cordials, Soothing Syrups and other preparations of like character by any but a physician should be strongly deprecated, and the druggist should not be a party to it. Children who are in need of medicine should receive the care of a physician, and it is nothing less than a crime to dose them willfully with narcotics.

Corn on the Cob —the Roasting Ear

Is not more delicious than the

New Post Toasties

In the growth of corn there is a period when the kernels are plumped out with a vegetable milk, most nutritious (roasting ears). As it slowly ripens this hardens and finally becomes almost flinty.

This nutritious part of the corn is cooked, seasoned, rolled thin, and covered by a new process which enhances the true corn flavour.

Different from ordinary corn flakes, the New Post Toasties have a distinctive form and flavour; and they keep their appetizing crispness, even after cream or milk is added.

These Superior Corn Flakes come oven-fresh in tight wax-sealed packages; and they cost no more than ordinary "corn flakes." Insist upon having

JAPANESE INNS ARE QUEER

Guests Must Leave Their Footwear in the Vestibule When Going to Their Rooms.

The entrance to native inns in Japan is most always a roofed vestibule with a wide-trodden earthen floor backed by a raised platform about twenty inches high, forming at once a seat and the outer extension of the floor.

A scattered line of shoes, sandals and gets belonging to the guests usually lie along it, and at one side is a cupboard, where umbrellas and footgear are deposited. A big drop occupies one side of the wall, a few steps hibachi and a pile of cushions generally occupies the other emplacement.

The traveler's first it customarily deposits him in the vestibule, at the edge of the platform, beneath the overhang of the roof. Shouts of "O Kyaku san" (hospitable visitor) apprise the maids and the maids that a guest is arriving, and all hurry forward to receive him, entering rows of welcome bowing gloudy black prade to the floor.

As the traveler sits on the platform a respectful maiden takes his shoes and places them in his wraps. Shoes are rarely placed, and if they be not so mucky they are left untouched. Habitual frequenters of inns offer prepared themselves with foot covering for it, as to the floor. I do the best rest and rest well, but here right on I am go talkee.—Tokio Jiji Shimpo.

Corn Cob Pipe Industry

Iowa Farmers Make Pipes Out of Cobs Which Are Sold Throughout Country.

Iowa farmers are making pipes out of corn cobs which are sold throughout the country. The pipes are made by a firm in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, which has been in the business for 25 years. The cobs are shipped to the factory in Cedar Rapids from all parts of the state. The cobs are made into pipes by a process which is a secret. The pipes are then sent to a factory where they are finished and packed for shipment. The pipes are made in all sizes and shapes and are sold at from 5 cents to $1 each. The demand for the pipes is said to be very good.

Tobacco Plant Oil.

The tobacco plant is used in making paper umbrellas in Japan is pressed out of the seeds of the rubber plant. Tobacco is one of the Indian seeds famous for oil and seeds from these plants are being tested in Tavoral for the cultivation of the plant and the oil is extracted from the seeds by the press. The plant, so called, is estimated at 20 bushels per acre. The amounts to 250,000 bushels, from ninety tons of seed. The oil is then filtered. The oil before it is used is boiled and then cooled until it can be applied by hand to another die, is a piece of cloth or waste. No machinery is used in the process. The oil is sold. When the oiling is complete the finished sheet of paper is ready for sale about five hours. This oil is also used in making the Japanese lanterns, artificial leather, waterproofing ink, lacquer, varnishes, oil, paper and paints.

The Silver Lining Appears.

Dealers in Silver Plate, Dress and Suit Makers have decreed that lovely woman's attire shall be more roomy and more ample than ever. This is a bright spot on the horizon for the cutlery trade. There are said to be 20,000,000 women in this country alone who wear clothes and spoons. The fashion requires a yard and a half more cloth for a dress, it would mean a consumption of 30,000,000 yards more cloth. Figures do not lie. Here is a ray of sunshine that ought to dissipate the gathering gloom. Now if the Filipinos and Chinese and Cubans and other nationalities that agitate for recognition in the world of civilization should follow the lead of the fashion and wear clothes and spoons, the demand for more cloth and more spoons would more than make up for the loss of the Mexican trade.

It is alleged that the cows were browsing in the vicinity of the tracks of the works plant north of the city, and, on account of a fence breaking down, they were allowed access to a quantity of dynamite stored in a ditch. It is further claimed that the animals ate the dynamite, and instead of being blown up in a spectacular way, died of indigestion.

A Condescension.

WHEN MOTOR STOPPED

OWNER COULD NOT MAKE OUT WHAT CAUSED TROUBLE.

Possibly the Fact That His Friend Had Forgotten to Perform a Simple Operation Went Far to Explain Matters.

The enthusiastic fisherman had bought a little motor boat and had taken his best friend for a day's fishing off Staten Island. Fluke were running and after several hours they had a mess of fish and were ready for home.

Now will crank up and see how long it takes this little motor to like her way back to the club," said the boat's owner with a good deal of satisfaction in his tone, for he was proud of his little 30-footer.

With an air of confidence the owner primed that motor and threw over the crank a few times. The motor began to hum, and with his friend at the wheel they started toward home. The owner sat down close to the engine, his head bent over it to enjoy the rhythm of its steady throb. He was proud and happy.

A moment later the engine slowed down and then stopped with a violent kickback. The man who owned the boat jumped as though he had been shot. It was his first experience with a crank one-cylinder.

Recovering himself he laughed, and his confidence restored, turned to the engine.

"It's the spark plug, Joe," he announced. "I knew that old I got wasn't any good. It's carbonized the spark plug. I'll fix it in a minute."

The spark plug was quickly taken out and washed off with kerosene. The motorboat enthusiast had read his book of instructions faithfully.

When the spark plug had been screwed in again and the wires connected the owner cranked for several minutes but without even a cough from the motor. A look of worry settled on his face and he cranked desperately.

"I know what the trouble is," he announced after a while. "Too much gasoline."

The carburetor was tinkered with and another attempt made to start the engine. No success.

"I was wrong," said the boat owner, smiling. "It's not getting enough gasoline."

Again the carburetor was adjusted and again the engine was cranked and cranked, but still not a trace of response from the little motor.

Desperate and mortified, the owner ferreted at the batteries, went over every bit of the engine equipment but could not find the cause of the trouble. Every few minutes he would crank the engine violently. He would have taken the motor apart, but lacked the necessary tools.

All the time the boat was drifting toward Sandy Hook and the new owner had not provided an anchor with his equipment, so there was nothing for it but to drift. Once they were almost used to the wash of one of the big Sandy Hook boats.

"Hey, Phil," called the boat owner's friend, just as the moon was peeping over the horizon. "Hey, Phil, look how it looks as though you were the gasoline when you told me to. Does that make any difference?"—New York Sun.

Gold Hunt Amid Dust.

What an incentive to industry gold is! The old government assay office in Wall street was torn down to the very last brick more than a week ago and everything to the very last speck was carted away.

Still the runners of the banks and brokerage houses hang around the excavation and from time to time scrape together a bagful of dirt in the hope that they may find some little nice lick dust.

All the plumbing in the old assay office has been burned and whatever the soldiers showed in gold is part of the receipts of the office.

The belief that the smoke from the furnaces going up the old chimney left a deposit of gold on some of the neighboring roofs, said inspired the Wall street boys. They have looked on some houses and said so little are sure their scrapings contain real dust.

Decidedly Disingenuous.

Hamilton Ish, Jr., who worked to defeat the new counties bill, said to an Albany reporter:

"They wanted to let women and children work more than twelve hours a day. They said this would be for the public good—it would save a lot of fruit and vegetables from rotting. But such a plea is disingenuous.

"That plea reminds me of the cabbie's little son, who entered the village tailor shop and said:

"Mr. Snip, will you please let father have some patterns of good, strong cloth?"

"Why, certainly, my boy," said Mr. Snip, with a beaming smile. "What does father want them for—suits, trousers, overcoats, or—"

"I think," told the boy, "he wants 'em to nail up his pea vines."

Pyrenees Tunnels.

Five tunnels through the Pyrenees are to make communication easier between France and Spain. The work on these tunnels is progressing rapidly in spite of the war. Spanish workmen having taken the places of the Frenchmen who have joined the army. The trains will be operated by electricity and June, 1916, may see them running.

In After Life.

"I suppose it's all right for a college boy to wear fancy clothes."

"Perhaps."

"But arrayed like that he'll never make a success of getting orders from hard-headed business men."

BULGARS ONLY PARTLY SLAV

Have Few of the Characteristics of That Race—Are Intensely Practical and Hard-Headed.

"The Bulgarians are nominally classed as Slavs. So they are—partly," says a writer in the Century. "Yet the world too often forgets that the primitive Bulgarians were not Slavs at all, but an Asiatic people of Turanian stock who in the seventh century, bearing the primitive Slavs heavily migrated south of the Danube, and settled down as masters. Less numerous than their subjects, the conquerors were soon absorbed, losing their speech and peculiar identity. Nevertheless, the blood was a potent one, for the Turanian Bulgars left behind far more than their name; they stamped upon the new folk traits which still distinctly apart in the category of Slav peoples. A moment's analysis will clearly prove this.

"Your typical Slav, whether he dwell on the Russian plains or the Servian hills, is an idealist, prone to lose sight of hard facts in daydreams. Capable of great accomplishments, when under the stimulus of his enthusiasm, in ordinary times the Slav is an easy-going, improvident, open-handed person, essentially likable, but lacking that practical characteristic, efficiency. How different the Bulgarian! Restrained, sober, poor, with occasional outbursts of passion, but usually taking even his pleasures sadly; intensely practical and hard-headed; without a trace of mysticism; frugal to the point of avarice; so solicitous about the future that this frequently becomes an obsession; shrewd, calculating, cool of head, dogged, plodding, almost ferocious energy translating itself normally into unremitting labor—such is the folk. 'The Bulgar on his ocean,' says the national proverb, 'pursues the hare, and overtakes it.'"

HOW ARABIANS TRAIN HORSES

Familiar Old Stories About Housing Them With Human Beings Are Mostly Fables.

So far as we know the Arabian breeders have no patented system of training their horses different from those prevailing among peoples of a similar degree of civilization, the Breeders' Gazette says. Naturally, the lack of pasture results in young Arabian horses being fed a considerable quantity of barley, and so, the story goes, at least, a not inconsiderable quantity of the fruit of the date palm, fresh and dried, by way of succulence.

The colts are broken usually barebacked at two or three years old. Their subsequent handling is much like that of all other horses the world over, the difference that so early in life as possible the young animals are accustomed to doing without water for increasing periods of time, in order to accustom them later on to the scarcity of liquids in desert journeys.

The ancient stories about the Arab steed being kissed and bawled over by his master's wives, slept with the living tent and foaled on the best silk rugs are picturesque fables containing about the same measure of truth as the one which dates the pedigrees of Arabian horses back to the mares owned in biblical times by King Solomon.

No Labor in Eden.

The inhabitants of Eden plainly lived without toil. They were born to that leisure for which we strive so fiercely in this work-a-day world. So far as the man was concerned, the sting of the expulsion was the fact that he had to go forth and eat bread in the sweat of his face. Jehovah did not announce this sentence at hard labor by putting a guard over Adam. Eve was not placed in charge, nor yet the wily serpent. The offender was merely driven forth from the garden that was full of trees. The trees had made it paradise.

Every tree that was pleasant to the sight and good for food was there. The inhabitants walked about in the comfortable shade and rested. When thirsty, a score of other trees yielded food and drink. The spontaneous productions of the garden even supplied the first demand for clothes. On that bitter day of expulsion there were no white happy harvesters of tree crops were driven forth from the fruit and fruitful shade, driven to the necessity of the sweat of the field and to wearily bread by the sweat of their faces.—Atlantic Monthly.

Need of More Training.

This is what one college president said in his address recently:

"With the multiplicity of subjects it is only to be expected that some anxiety may be felt as to the results. Time-honored methods of teaching, I must confess, there is some need for this suggestion of anxiety; perhaps the pendulum has swung too far, or we may not have discovered the correct scientific method of dealing with the subjects taught in the classroom and I feel convinced that training is not receiving its fair share of attention. There was much wastage of time in the past, but the old-fashioned grinding was not without its good points, one of which was the cultivation of the faculty of sticking to a task until it was done."

Caused by Magnifying Glass.

A house was recently burned down in New York recently because someone had left a magnifying glass leaning against a wicker sewing basket. The glass focused the rays of the sun and focused them on the inflammable material in the basket, a blaze followed, and before the frightened girl got out the damage had resulted.

Army of Doctors.

In proportion to its numbers, the American army is better off than any other for doctors—all first-rate men selected by means of a stiff competitive examination. Humanity is indebted to them for many valuable contributions to medical science. The military triumph of the occupation of Cuba was due to the researches made by a board of American army doctors which established the truth of the mosquito theory of the transmission of yellow fever. Later on this discovery rendered possible the digging of the Panama canal.

Test of the Parotic.

On account of his muscular weakness the handiness of the parotic will show a characteristic tremor. His defective memory may be exhibited by asking him to write down some foolish sentence like "The Fourth of July comes on October 15 of this year," and he loses track of the word-success after getting one, two or three. The neurasthenic could remember this much.

Nature's Protection.

It is a curious fact that when a fish becomes blind it turns almost black in color. Nature offers some good protective coloring trade to hide the fish the color it uses in its surroundings. Then the pool with light-colored walls will be much lighter in color than those of the same species where the surroundings are dark.

Auntie Evidently Not a Venus.

A maiden lady said to her little nephew: "Now, Johnny, you go to bed early and always do as and you'll be rosy cheeked and handsome when you grow up." Johnny hooked over this a few minutes and then he observed: "Well, aunty, you must have sat up a good deal when you were young."

Built on the Rock Eternal

By Warner Littlejohn

(Copyright, 1915, by W. G. Chapman.)

"You are very unfair!"

"Why, not at all, dear? In this world the man who looks out sharply for his own interests wins. That's what I have done."

At a cost to the business here and a personal loss on the part of Hackett. "You are not an honest man."

John Hackett flushed up. His hard face became resentful, then vicious.

"I'll prosecute you if you say that outside!" he blustered.

"I have no intention of doing so," replied William Harry. In his usual quiet, but meaning way. "I drop all the mean details of your shrewd manipulation of affairs here, shall withdraw my capital and say goodbye."

"Look here, Harry!" cried Hackett aghast. "you can't mean that!"

"I do—unquestionably. There is one hundred and fifty thousand, my honest and capital crossing me. There cannot be over double that, for all the years you have been using the money of the firm in outside deals in which I rightfully should have a share. My lawyer will call to make the final settlement. Good-day."

It was a serious break in both business and family relations, but William Harry went on the peaceful tenor of his way unruffled. He said to his friend:

"I have simply retired," he told his intimate friend Fellows, "I have always worked to an end, and am now rich enough to promise my life fulfillment."

"You got half a million!" Hackett chuckled to himself, "and no discussion about it. Here I strive to overshadow Harry—now I can reach my ambition."

After that William Harry quietly bowed politely to his former partner when he passed him on the street. He petted Hackett, in his soul he recognized the lofty superiority of an honest man. Then, too, he secretly admired as he realized that in fact and truth he had outstripped Harry.

Four two years his only child, methereless Felice, and Arnold Harry had been friends, closer, almost lovers. The first thing Hackett did was to send his daughter away to boarding school. Felice understood what this meant—a chasm to her pleasant relations with Arnold.

The latter had just graduated as a physician. Hackett had made acquaintance with the plan his father had formed. Upon his success in life depended, in his mind and capital at work.

The dream of his life." William Harry called it. In due course of time the people of Winston saw the house in Willow Hill Terrace, the finest in many years removed to a selected plot of the locality, and the talk of the county of which it stood. It was fitted in by itself, surrounded by a park, the center of the larger plot the architect of the construction of a proposition building was begun.

"He said was intended for the spot was a natural lark. At first it was believed that the heirs were building a summer hotel. Then the truth began to leak out.

The dream of William Harry's life was to maintain a summer home for their mutual children, and their children's children, gathered from the money of the firm in outside deals in which I rightfully should have a share. My lawyer will call to make the final settlement. Good-day."

WONDERFUL CAVE IN MINE

Michigan College of Mines Has Collection of Minerals From Cavern That Had To Be Blasted.

The Michigan College of Mines has a collection of minerals from the wonderful Sharitock cave near Iron River, in Ironton, Ironwood county, Michigan. The thick cave was discovered in 1913, after a heavy blast on the third level in the Sharitock mine. When the miner who had fired the shot returned with the night shift, he found a great opening that reached farther than the light could penetrate. Looking upward, he could see tiny lights flashing and in the belief that they were stars, he ran back to the shaft and declared that he had blasted a hole through to the surface. On investigation, the mine officials found that the blast had opened a great circular cavern 100 feet in diameter and 175 feet high, which seemed like a piece of fairyland. On the roof, myriads of crystals reflected the lights from the miners' lamps. The walls, the roof, and the floor were covered with great clusters of crystals, and near the center of the cavern a mass of stalactites, 30 feet long, hung from the ceiling like a great chandelier. For the most part the crystals were pure white; but in places where the filtering waters had contained iron and copper, great transparent stalactites and stalagmites, some ruby red, others a clear emerald green or azure blue, added to the beauty of the scene. The mining company illuminated the cave with electricity, and has permitted thousands of visitors to see it. The mine workers had to fill the cave with waste rock—a precaution that led them to send the specimens of minerals to the Michigan College of Mines.

FEW PERFECT DAYS IN LIFE

Like All Other Joys, It Is Because They Are So Rare That They Are So Highly Prized.

There is a pretty little sentimental song which begins with the words, "When you come to the end of a perfect day." It relates to true friendship and to an unforgettable incident, and it suggests that perfect days are rare in human experience. Perhaps they are. For perfect days depend upon many factors, and some of them are beyond the control of the individual. To cannot produce a perfect day at will, any more than you can summon perfect weather to suit your convenience.

The hasty conception of a perfect day would be such a one as falls out to be entirely to your liking in every respect. That requires a combination of circumstances which is exceptional. You might set forth in the morning with the determination that, in respect to your own actions and affairs and your power over them, the day should be perfect, but in an hour or two external influences might interfere and the whole thing go glimmering. If, later, no one element lacking, whether it be an environment, in the attitude of others, or in yourself, perfection is not secured, and the day takes its place in the common category, inserting neither sour nor rhapsody, and occupying no permanent place in the storehouse of fond recollections. In fact, it is the very rarity of perfect days in a lifetime that makes the subject one of comment, of story, of poetry, of cherished memories.

Jostling Refrigerator.

One of the most practical junkets that Uncle Sam has ever sponsored is the specially fitted refrigerator car that has been started around the country to demonstrate proper methods of handling eggs and poultry for shipment.

The car is a complete refrigerating laboratory, which carries its own engine to operate the cooling apparatus.

It is divided into two rooms. The first is at a temperature slightly below normal, for the gradual cooling of the poultry before it is placed in the other room, which is the refrigerator.

Experts from the department of agriculture make the demonstrations with poultry and eggs supplied by the local dealers. The scientific handling of eggs and their skillful packing for long shipment are also demonstrated.

Petoskey News: Reports from Florida's Bay bring news of some lively bass fishing in the harbor off the mouth of Horton's creek this week. Some good catches of rainbow trout have also been made there this week and some fine large speckled trout have just been caught in the lower bends of Horton's creek.

There is located in Grand Traverse bay, one mile from Traverse City, one of the region's most noted and curious beauty spots Marion island. Sloping up a hundred feet from the blue water surrounding it, the island consists of 198 acres of absolutely virgin timber. There has an air defied the natural beauty of the place. The island, besides having the distinction of being one of the very few tracts in this region untouched by lumbering operations, has an added distinction in that it is the legacy of an old lake captain to his beloved daughter. In early times Indians called the place by the unflattered appellation of Hog island, undoubtedly because of its high-backed contour.

Petoskey News: Over at Harbor Point everything is hustle and bustle in preparation for the wedding of Miss Catherine Barker, reputed to be the richest, nineteen-year-old girl in the world, to Howard Spaulding, of Chicago, which will take place in the sun parlors of the magnificent summer place of the bride, Saturday, July 31, at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The point is just now the mecca for nearly a hundred newspaper and magazine writers and photographers and Miss Barker is kept as busy as a bee. This wedding is the feature event of the whole summer here in the United States, and Harbor Point is just now the most widely advertised and the most talked about summer place in the country. Miss Barker is an orphan, her mother having died when she was born a child and her father a few years ago.

A Rip-Roaring Comedy From Beginning to End

Love in a Hurry

By GELETT BURGESS

Author of "The White Cat," "The Heart Line," etc.

ON the day before his twenty-eighth birthday Hall learned that his uncle had left him four millions provided he married before he was twenty-eight. Hall had not contemplated marriage, but he got busy! He proposed to (1) a languishing widow, (2) a breezy debutante, (3) a fascinating model, all in the space of two hours. They all "took it under advisement," and about the time they all decided to accept, Hall realized that he was really in love with Flodie, his typist. Then he had to hustle to get out of his entangling alliances.

Love in a hurry is the quintessence of all that is really funny, a comedy courtship that touches the spot.

Selfishness, per se, is reprehensible, but the selfishness that places the interests of your own town against those of any other town is a virtue.

Geo. Shaw Cook, the eminent Christian Science teacher and lecturer, of Chicago, will speak at the Charlevoix Theatre Sunday afternoon next.

We always get a midsummer gale. For this season the visit occurred Tuesday. It was a north-easter, and it was accompanied by a steady down-pour of rain.

The Masonic fair, to open next Monday, is an enterprise in which all our citizens are interested. It will continue six days and evenings, and it will be a great event.

Lee Howland, who has been in Florida for a year, is here on business. Mr. Howland has a ten thousand dollar paving contract in Cars, and expects to begin work there at once.

The Antrim County Fair will receive state aid to the amount of $190 as the share of the $60,000 appropriated by the last legislature to promote agricultural exhibits. Charlevoix county gets $111.

Not only will the fair be of interest to the general public, but the fine quarters of the Fraternity should be inspected by those who have not yet made them a visit.

Leroy Hamlin, the well known Hayes farmer, is very ill in Petoskey hospital. Last Thursday he was out in Lake Michigan in a boat fishing, when he was stricken with paralysis in his right arm. With his other arm he managed to get the boat ashore, where he was found in bad shape. He was taken home and afterward to the hospital, where it was found necessary to operate on his spine. At last accounts he was improving.

The Lincoln Chautauqua has come and gone. Financially it did not come up to expectations or pledged guarantee. The concensus of opinion is that it was not up to the standard set by the Chautauqua of last year. Some of the numbers were fairly good; some of them were pretty cheap. The Bland orchestra was the best number given, and former Senator "Billy" Mason's "lecture" the worst. Notoriety as an attraction falls far short of renown. We are of the opinion that this winds up the Chautauqua business for Charlevoix unless the trend of merit is upward instead of downward.

The big lot sale of the Ward addition occurs to-day (Thursday).

"A Modern Cinderella" at the Opera House Thursday night, August 5th.

Mr. and Mrs. E. K. Warren, of Three Oaks, visited Rev. C. E. Taggart last week.

The Women's Missionary Society of the M. E. church will hold a baked goods sale at F. S. Bettes' store, Saturday, Aug. 7th. Sale begins at 9 a.m.

The farmers are beginning to complain of a backward corn crop. The weather the past two weeks has not been favorable for corn, but the silo affords some consolation.

John Cameron and wife, of Minneapolis, arrived here Friday, called by the very serious illness of Mr. Cameron's father, Alex. Cameron, whose condition, we regret to say, does not improve.

The 9th to the 14th are the dates of the Masonic fair, therefore the fair opens next Monday morning. Every thing points to a most successful event. The contributions from wholesale establishments have been generous, and our own business men have joined liberally in the good work.

Considerable excitement was caused Tuesday afternoon during the severe easterly gale, when both a coast guard and fire alarm were sent in from the Belvedere hotel. The fire alarm was an error, but the department with full equipment had almost reached the scene before they were headed off. A sloop with four people on board had an hour's tussle with the waves before they were headed off. The sloop was finally brought safely to port, and the boat dragged anchor and went ashore in a lively sea.

The most annoying violation of law in this city is the continual and persistent contempt shown the ordinance against the riding of bicycles on the sidewalks. It is not only annoying at times to the citizen who walks, but it is annoying to contemplate that there are those who flout the law. Ordinances are meant to be enforced or they would not be enacted. Enforce or repeal and let it be a free-for-all.

The circulation of initiative petitions for the prohibition amendment has begun in a number of counties, but will not commence in this region for a month or so. Under the law 48,000 signatures must be obtained in the state and filed with the secretary of state at Lansing, but it is expected that fully 100,000 will be obtained. The election will occur at the regular fall election in 1916, and the petition must be filed about six months before that date. The various bodies interested in the prohibition movement pass to have them ready by October.

The annual North Michigan Camp Meeting of the Church of God will be held in their beautiful grove, two miles south of the Belvedere station, Charlevoix, beginning Friday, Aug. 6, and will continue ten days. The grounds are equipped with a pavilion, boarding house, barn, and other conveniences suitable for the occasion. Able ministers, evangelists and gospel workers will be present and the best meeting stricken with paralysis in his right arm. With his other arm he managed to get the boat ashore, where he was found in bad shape. He was taken home and afterward to the hospital, where it was found necessary to operate on his spine. At last accounts he was improving.

CAPTURED WITH THE GOODS

Beach Hotel Thieves Brought Back From Chicago—Good Work by Sheriff Novak.

Sheriff Novak returned from Chicago Sunday morning having in custody Chester E. Murray and Lilian Hutchinson, who, up to about a week ago, were electrician and stenographer, respectively, at the Beach Hotel, on a charge of grand larceny, and they occupy cells in the county bastile.

As stated above, the two were employes of the hotel, representing themselves as man and wife, and were assigned to a room in the Faulkner cottage, near by. While yet here there were complaints of missing jewelry, etc., and a quiet investigation begun.

Evidently Murray and his inamorita were "put wise," as they decided to leave, covering their departure with running publicity, but giving it out that they were to take the Northland at Mackinac for Buffalo. They went north, and at Mackinac they sent a special delivery letter to a party here that they were about to take the Northland, but instead of the Northland, they doubled back on the Manitou, passing their stateroom at this port.

All these facts were dug out by the sheriff and Prosecutor Lewis, and the sheriff shot for Chicago. He at once communicated with the police, and an advertisement was inserted in the papers "Wanted—An electrician." It worked. The third man to apply was Murray, and he was nabbed. His stopping place was located, and there the woman was found, together with a trunk full of plunder much of it with the Beach Hotel stencil upon it, the remainder undoubtedly belonging to guests.

In the Faulkner cottage, where the alleged thieves roomed, was a vacant room in which Mr. Faulkner had stored a large empty trunk. This was the trunk in which was found the stolen goods in Chicago. The clever work of Sheriff Novak in Chicago is the subject of much favorable comment, while here Prosecutor Lewis did good work. They are a good team. This is a bad place for crooks while Charlie Novak and Rolla Lewis are on the job.

When spread out in the sheriff's office the plunder filled the room. Besides the linen, there were toilet articles, cribbage boards, electrical suppliies and tools, phonograph tools belonging to Robert Boothroyd, carpenter's tools owned by John Curtis, various tools belonging to John Baker, a revolver and a bunch of keys to which was attached a lock-picking appliance, a phonograph, yet unclaimed. There were many other articles "too numerous to mention," as the auction bills say.

Murray and the woman were arraigned in Justice Feltz' court Monday morning, where they waived examination. They were immediately taken before Circuit Judge Mayne where they pleaded guilty. Sentence by Judge being compelled to leave at once for Leland, sentence was deferred until his return, which will probably be Saturday.

COMMON COUNCIL.

At the council meeting Monday night the State Street Sewer resolution was passed, and the board of assessors went into session Tuesday morning.

The above mentioned sewer will be from the south line of Hurlburt avenue on State street, thence north to Park avenue, thence east on Park avenue to alley in rear of the Gokey and Fowler buildings, thence to river.

Wm. Newman was awarded the contract to paint the water works building, hydrants and street marking posts.

REPUBLICAN BANQUET

Annual County Rally of Republicans to Occur at Boyne City Aug. 27th.

At the informal meeting of representative republicans from all over the county, held in this city Wednesday evening, says the Boyne Citizen, it was decided to hold the annual rally and banquet here on Friday evening, Aug. 27. The attendance was large and spirited discussions of the prospects for a complete republican victory in 1916 proved that Charlevoix county has stood undaunted through the past three years and will again be in the fight.

Fish stories entertained those present for a short time. J. M. Harris sprung the one about Boyne's big sturgeon but Judge Mayne closed the discussion with one which had it all over our story.

President Coykendall opened the subject of a date for the Charlevoix county Republican Club banquet and rally which was set for the date mentioned above, that being the most convenient day for all concerned. Committees were appointed and arrangements made for the greatest rally in years.

Several speakers of national reputation were mentioned as available for the event, among them being Uncle Joe Cannon, Townsend, Diekema, Grant Fellows, Fordney, William Alden Smith. The latter will be a man well worth hearing for he will be a republican candidate for the presidency in 1916. Two or more famous men will be present although they may not have lengthy speeches.

Membership cards are now in the hands of the club secretary, T. O. Bissell, and will be sold for 50c. All funds thus raised will be used to defray the expenses of the banquet and spent in promoting the interests of the party in Charlevoix county.

It is hoped that the attendance this year will be such as to prove the contention that four years under the present party administration is sufficient for those who give the politics of the nation thought. Everyone is invited who is now or cares to become affiliated with the republican party. The plates will sell for $1.00.

A SAMPLE OF YELLOW JOURNALISM

The Chicago American of the 31 has wood type "years head" of the statement that on Monday morning early the steamship Manitou went ashore in the fog just north of the Chicago break water, and that the Chicago coast guard station received a call for help.

But the amazing statement winds up as follows: "It is stated that the Manitou was simply lying out in the lake as her habit early Monday morning."

The fact is, the steamship was "killing time" which accrues on her schedule, and may have touched her nose on the nearby bathing beach, but the statement that the Manitou stranded is only a sample of duty yellow journalism.

On one of the Manitou's trips she "loafs" just off Mackinac Island for an hour, rather than get ahead of her schedule time. When Capt. Billy Finucan's boat sticks her nose on the beach you may know that something very much out of the ordinary brought it about, but the best of them get it once in a while.

The Manitou docked at this port on time Tuesday morning, indicating that very little time was lost by reason of the "disaster."

SWELL WEDDING.

Miss Chatherine Barker, of Chicago, who may be the wealthiest young woman in the world, was wed to Howard Spaulding, Jr., of Chicago, July 31, at Harbor Point. Her father left her about $30,000,000.

It has just become known that the two were secretly engaged a year ago, and is said to be a pure love match. Miss Barker was fourteen years old five years ago when she met Mr. Spaulding, the son of a Chicago jeweler, a graduate of Yale, and an officer in the Haskell Barker Co., of which her father was the head.

Mrs. Spaulding, the charming bride, is fond of golf, tennis, boating, swimming and dancing, and spends most of her time in the open air. Her husband is also a devotee of sports and from the time the two first met they found they had so many things in common that they just couldn't get along without one another.

The Barker family estate is one of the show places of Harbor Point. Mrs. Spaulding has been going there to spend the summer ever since she was three years old. Her mother died when she was thirteen years old and her father's death six years later left her the sole owner of the great Haskell-Barker Co.

Upon the death of her father Miss Barker was left in charge of her guardian, James B. Forgan, president of the First National Bank of Chicago.

PROGRESS OF THE WAR.

The Russians have evacuated Warsaw and are making a masterly retreat to a defensive fighting a superior rear guard action. The Czar's army is by no means whipped. The Russians have a delightful habit of coming back with a stiff solar plexus punch. They have done it twice in this war and they will do it again.

On the western front the allies are still holding their own and a little better. That the stalemate in Flandrs has broken there is little doubt, but with what result no one can now foretell.

The Italians are having it pretty much their own way.

At the Dardanelles the progress of the allies is slow, but the defeat of the Turks is inevitable.

Very much is being said in the papers now about Rev Beach, the distinguished novelist, who was born in this country near Atwood, twelve miles south of this city, and where it is proposed to place a tablet. The editor of this paper several times entertained Rev and Mrs. Beach and mother at his home on Park avenue, this city, and she trotted Rex on his knee. The Beach family moved to Ft. Wayne, Ind., S. K. Bagley, the parents of Mrs. W. A. Smith, were near neighbors and intimate friends for many years.

SYNOPSIS.

Hall Bonistelle, artist-photographer engaged for the day's work in Mr. Doremus' office.

CHAPTER I—Continued.

Hall laughed heartily. "Can't be! You don't know Uncle John! He was the most unselfishness I ever saw breathed. Talk about cranks! He never did approve of me—too artistic! And I was not enough of a prude to be independent. Result, I have to take photographs for a living. Why, Flodie, he's just as likely to have left me a dime with a hole in it, and let it go at that."

Flodie sighed in sympathy, and said, "Well, these little ones be paid in advance! And there's just seventy-seven cents in the bank box!"

"Good Lord, is it as bad as that? Well, we'll have to collect a few bills in a hurry!" Hall appeared to dismiss the subject.

But Flodie was not to be dismissed. "Well also knew his procrastination. "You're all collared, Mr. Bonistelle!" she protested; "every last one! You can trust me to attend to that! And Tess had to go home and bed like a French poodle, too!"

Hall, walking back and forth, seemed not to be listening but suddenly he turned to his assistant with an open expression of relief. "I walked up to her and put his hand on her cheek."

"See here, Flodie, how would you like your salary regularly every week?"

"Now, don't you try to shake me!" Flodie tried to pull away but it was too delicious. "Oh, I don't know!" she mumbled. "Or leastways—some weeks, perhaps. That's all right." Now it was she who caught hold of his sleeve. "But I wanted to tell you something, Mr. Bonistelle—I wouldn't mind—If you just let me—"

"What?" he demanded suspiciously.

"Oh, then—I'd have to be willing—or! If I like to, you know—you know I've saved up a little money, Mr. Bonistelle—and, well, it might help you temporarily—do you credit—"

Hall threatened her with savage playfulness. "Flodie Fisher," he said determinedly, "if you ever dare to mention such a thing to me again, I'll—I'll discharge you!" He took a turn up and down the room as she waited, watching him. "By Jove, it does look as if I have to go to work!" Then he turned to her gloomily, "Well, anything else for business?"

"No," said Flodie, "but you have to develop and print, you know. There's lots of work for you in the dark room. And then, we've got to get ready for that expensive old party."

Hall scratched his head. "Heavens, I'd forgotten all about it!"

"Of course you have, but I haven't; I've attended to everything. Music, caterer—and decorations—furious old nonsense it was too, I don't see how you can afford it, Mr. Bonistelle. Really I don't!" Flodie was very stern.

"It's business, Flodie—keeps the women curious. Makes 'em talk! Oh, well," Hall tossed it off his mind. "We'll get along somehow. Well, run along, Flo, now; I suppose I've got to get ready to preside at this altar of vanity. Good Lord! How I dread it! Flo, I honestly believe a photographer knows more of the actual truth about women than a doctor or a priest!"

Flodie gave him an indulgent smile. "Mr. Bonistelle, I wagt to tell you something. All three of them got together know mighty little!" So saying, she gave him a prim curtsy and retired to the office.

CHAPTER II.

Hall laughed and then stood thoughtful for a few moments, smoking airily, blowing rings. Then he took off his dressing gown, put on his coat, and had turned to his camera when Flodie came back.

"There's a desperate old flirt out here to see you, Mr. Bonistelle—Mr. Doremus."

"Doremus!" Hall scarched his memory. "What does he look like—a bill collector?"

"No, he's just a nice old man with a side-whisker effect, trimmed with a gold chain to scalloop, and he kisses as you over the top of his glasses."

Hall sighed. "Well, have him in. I'll settle him!"

Mr. Doremus, grave and precise, looked about for a chair, and sat down ceremoniously. He seemed in the inside pocket of his frock coat as he said pomsaucily: "Hm. I took the first opportunity to communicate with you, Mr. Bonistelle. Unhappily, however, I could not get you on the telephone this morning." Still his hand groped in his pocket, like a dog at a woodchuck's hole.

"No?" Hall remarked impatiently "I suppose I wasn't up."

Doremus brought forth a long envelope. Solemnly he spoke, looking over the top of the rubber bows. "Mr. Bonistelle, I have the honor of being the attorney for the estate of your uncle, the late John Beaufort Bonistelle."

A minimal thunderbolt struck the room, and Hall, shocked and frightened, could only gasp. "Eh—is there any news about the will, Mr. Doremus? Here, have a cigar!"

Doremus looked up and nodded gravely. "Yes, the will has been found, Mr. Bonistelle, at last!" He tapped the paper in his hand. "It was discovered this morning at eight twenty-seven o'clock. You see I have been prompt, sir."

Hall restrained an overwhelming curiosity. "Where did you find it?" he asked faintly.

"Ah, curious. Most curious. An eccentric man, your uncle, Mr. Bonistelle. It was found in his safe. In fact, if you will believe me, between the leaves of his new book—Dream of Fusius, the one he wrote himself—'Have Business and How to Prosper.' I believe it is called. I have not yet had the pleasure of reading it."

Mr. Doremus stopped, and gave the young man a steady inspection. "I understand that you will be twenty eight upon the fourth of May, Mr. Bonistelle. Am I correct?"

"Yes. Tomorrow week. Why?"

Mr. Doremus solemnly held up his hands. "Wait!" he commanded. Let me, before I go through the whole document, give you a synopsis."

Flodie, peeping through the door, was breathlessly listening. Hall was growing restless.

"Ke—there it is." Mr. Doremus proceeded to read, "'To my nephew, Hall Bonistelle, on condition that you will be twenty years of my minis I leave to my beloved nephew, Hall Bonistelle, on condition that you will be twenty years of age, provided you shall have attained the age of twenty-eight years.'"

"Oh, I know it! Well, it's all up then—pass the buns!"

"If, however, at the beginning of his twenty-eighth birthday he is still unmarried, the property is to be the property of my beloved cousin, Jonas Hassingbury, as a testimony to our youthful friendship." Mr. Doremus looked up.

Hall was scowling. "Let's see it!" he demanded, and he took the document, and read the clause over and over to himself, while Mr. Doremus' eyes drifted sideways about the apartment. "Hot stuff! Well, I guess I'm all right! Jonas Hassingbury's going to get that money!"

"Yes, confound him!" The peculiarly startling bass voice of Flodie Fisher cried. "Four millions, Flodie! Think of it! Good Lord, isn't it ferocious? And it's just too bad about the time when Uncle John died—but, Lord, what's the use of talking!" He sulked doggedly back into the studio, and gave a vicious swing to his camera.

Flodie Fisher followed him in, she stood looking at him pensively. She spoke slowly, softly, deliberately. "Why don't you go ahead and get the money, Mr. Bonistelle?"

"Get the money? How?"

"Why, get married!" Flodie turned suddenly crimson.

"Why, who in the world would have me?"

Flodie swallowed down a lump in her throat. "Oh," she said, "I'm sure there's some nice girl who'd be so proud to marry you, Mr. Bonistelle."

"Well, I don't know how I'm to find her—and I'm not decided little time to look. Why do you realize that I've only got till midnight to do the whole thing in? Why, we were up to her, "Add do you imagine that any woman would want to be married in that way?"

"Oh, when you're in love, it doesn't matter how soon."

"A hurricane wooing, eh? By jove, I wonder—" He stared at her with a new light in his eyes. "Say, you really think I could get away with it? Why, I never—"

"Oh, you could do anything, Mr. Bonistelle. I'm certain you could!"

"Do you know of any woman who'd have me—that quick?"

Lighting Turin.

The city of Turin is occupied with the task of reorganizing the public lighting on a modern basis, and not less than $600,000 will be employed for this purpose, the work to be carried out from 1914 to 1916. According to the plans, arc lamps will be used in all the main streets and avenues, also the public squares, while smaller streets are to be lighted by incandescent lamps. Flaming arcs in closed globes will be used. About 3,000 lamps of 2,000 candle power each will be installed in some places incandescent lamps are used, some being of the 1,000 candle power type, and the rest of 100 or 200 candle power. There are much better than the present gas lamps which give only 50 candle power. Current for the whole system comes from the municipal electric station.—Indianapolis News.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT REASON

Fair Co-ed's Explanation of Caller's Late Stay Seemed Eminently Satisfactory.

The telephone rang, and the voice of an Ohio State university "co-ed" said: "Hello! Do you know who is calling?"

"Of course," was the reply. "I recognize the charming quality of your voice."

"Well," she said, "Have you a good story for today?"

"What will I get if I give you a good story?"

"If it is a good one, you will get your name in print."

"Huh! she again eloquently remarked.

"Talking" sated central, breaking in.

"Of course I am talking," said the "coed," and then she continued to the reporter: "The story is about a young man who took me to a picture show. When we returned he stayed so late that my mother had to call from the top of the stairs and tell him it was nearly twelve o'clock."

"That is interesting," said the reporter, "but it is hardly worth giving to the public. It seems to lack point."

"But I haven't come to the point, and I don't come to it unless you ask me for the reason for his late staying."

"Well, what was the reason?" the reporter asked.

"I am," she replied.

FOUGHT BANDITS FOR MANY YEARS

"Outlaw Tamer" Canada Freed the Transmissouri Region of Train Robbers.

BAD MEN WIPED OUT

Organized Famous "Bandit Hunters" and Ended Career of Hole in the Wall, Hall's Aces and Other Gangs.

Omaha, Neb.—The death of Bill Canada here recently removed a professional outlaw hunter, a man who cleared the country between the Missouri river and the Salt Lake valley of train robbers and road agents and instilled such fear in their hearts that the only two outlaw leaders remaining alive have for ten years been in Chile, afraid to come back.

For thirty years Canada was engaged in lighting the battles of civilization on the western plains, with his death one of the most pitiful instances—ah, she could indulge one's youthful dreams!" He shook his head sentimentally. "Si la jeunesse savait, si la vieillesse pouvait!"

Hall watched him bamboozled. "Say, Doremus, you're all right!" Mr. Doremus was looking over his shoulder to get a glimpse of Flodie. Hall had an idea. "I say," he suggested, "why not come around here tonight and—I'll have a wake over my lost fortune. I'm giving a small party, Flodie, and there will be just a few of my clients and an actress or two—"

"Oh, for heaven's sake!" cried Hall. "I know all about that. Didn't Uncle John talk me to death on the subject? Why didn't he get married himself?"

"Ah, unfortunate love-affair, I understand, prevented his putting his own theories into practice," said Doremus. "I think—mind, I do not say so positively—but it is possible that, between—knowing, you understand, his peculiar theories—"

"Acted accordingly?" said Hall. "Married on the chance of becoming an heir? Hrugh Hosa! Just it's too late now, Lord!"

"It is, as you say, too late, practically, I presume," Mr. Doremus remarked "but, legally, I must remind you that the time has not yet expired. You have until midnight, you understand, in which to qualify for the inheritance. Much has been done in fourteen hours, Mr. Bonistelle."

"Fourteen hours!" Hall repeated. "Why, fourteen days would be little enough time. You can't put a thing like marriage through on a time schedule, you know, can you?"

"I confess I do not know," said Mr. Doremus, rising.

Hall sat in a brown study, regarding his boots, as Mr. Doremus prepared to leave. Flodie, her eyes bright with excitement, tiptoed back into the office.

Mr. Doremus deposited the paper upon the table. "Well, I shall leave you this copy to inspect at your leisure. You may not be aware that I am a justice of the peace, Mr. Bonistelle. I shall be quite willing to accommodate you, should you find a bride. I think I could perform a creditable ceremony as any clergyman—at half price!" He chuckled at the idea.

Hall, in no mood for jests, rose and politely said, "Where is Uncle Jonas—Mr. Hassingbury?" he asked. "Lord, he ought to be a happy man, about now!"

Mr. Doremus paused. "I took the first opportunity of telegraphing to Mr. Hassingbury," he said, "informing him of the provisions of J. B. Bonistelle's will. I requested his immediate appearance in town, and I have no doubt that he will arrive here some time during the day."

"Think of that old hypocrite getting all that money!" Hall exclaimed. "Lord, it makes me ill—hell be a blow and times more disgusting than ever, with his religious book and his charity talk!"

Mr. Doremus lifted an eloquent finger. "As an executor, you understand I must preserve an attitude of strict impartiality," he admonished. "At the same time, in my private capacity, I confess that I am on the side of youth. Your ambitions—ah, she could indulge one's youthful dreams!" He shook his head sentimentally. "Si la jeunesse savait, si la vieillesse pouvait!"

Hall watched him bamboozled. "Say, Doremus, you're all right!" Mr. Doremus was looking over his shoulder to get a glimpse of Flodie. Hall had an idea. "I say," he suggested, "why not come around here tonight and—I'll have a wake over my lost fortune. I'm giving a small party, Flodie, and there will be just a few of my clients and an actress or two—"

"Oh, for heaven's sake!" cried Hall. "I know all about that. Didn't Uncle John talk me to death on the subject? Why didn't he get married himself?"

"Ah, unfortunate love-affair, I understand, prevented his putting his own theories into practice," said Doremus. "I think—mind, I do not say so positively—but it is possible that, between—knowing, you understand, his peculiar theories—"

"Acted accordingly?" said Hall. "Married on the chance of becoming an heir? Hrugh Hosa! But it's too late now, Lord!"

"It is, as you say, too late, practically, I presume," Mr. Doremus remarked "but, legally, I must remind you that the time has not yet expired. You have until midnight, you understand, in which to qualify for the inheritance. Much has been done in fourteen hours, Mr. Bonistelle."

"Fourteen hours!" Hall repeated. "Why, fourteen days would be little enough time. You can't put a thing like marriage through on a time schedule, you know, can you?"

"I confess I do not know," said Mr. Doremus, rising.

"Oh, upward of four millions, I suppose," said Mr. Doremus with unction.

"Ah, I lose all that, just because I'm a day—man!" Hall dropped into gloomy, idle a chair.

Mr. Doremus bowed sobbery. "Your uncle held strong views, Mr. Bonistelle. He firmly believed in marriage. He thought it a duty. He maintained high ideals for the future of the race."

"Oh, for heaven's sake!" cried Hall. "I know all about that. Didn't Uncle John talk me to death on the subject? Why didn't he get married himself?"

Skeleton of Man, Drowned in 1883 is Washed Up by Flood in Arizona.

Tweetsburg, Ark.—The skeleton of Frank Wilson, farmer, drowned in a flood in the Red river 32 years ago, was found on a sand bar in that stream a few days ago, having been washed up by the recent flood.

The skeleton was inclosed in all the clothes and a pair of boots Wilson wore at the time he met death. A knife and coin found in the pocket served to identify the victim. His family claimed the body.

Turners Make Good Soldiers.

"More than 15,000 German turners have been decorated with the Iron Cross, the highest war honor," declared, writes Dr. Hugo Rosh, secretary of the Turnverein Philadelphia, in a letter to George Brooke, veteran Mexican war soldier.

In commending upon the ability of turners as soldiers, Professor Rosh says:

"The exceptional training that turners are given in the gymnasium makes them most efficient as soldiers. There are more than 500,000 serving the Kaiser in their gymnastic training, long before it was conceived a few years later thousands of rough characters found themselves out of work and ready for any venture that promised excitement and big pay. From their ranks were recruited the train robbers."

THOUGHT SHE COULD NOT LIVE

Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Unionville, Mo.—"I suffered from a female trouble and I got so weak that I could hardly walk across the floor without holding on to something. I had nervous spells and my fingers would cramp and my face would rave, and I could not speak, nor sleep to act good, had no appetite, and everyone thought I would not live. Some one advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I had taken so much medicine and my doctor said he could do me no good so I told my husband he might get me a bottle and I would try it. By the time I had taken it I felt better. I continued its use, and now I am well and strong.

Transportation of Infantry.

Bicycle corps as a transportation of infantry by autos are well known to the military authorities of all countries. There are circumstances, such as the condition of roads in bad weather for example, when the only means of advancement for infantry is the old one of four marching, and the military chiefs, recognizing this, have kept their men in training for this important part of their profession. It is said that so little foot marching has never before been necessary to the troops as in the present war in western Europe, where railroad connections are maintained for the transportation of their men from one point to another by both sides, and where the automobile has played so important a role in this connection.

And as fresh air, exercise, and good food are the principal factors, it is important that food be selected which contains the essential nutritive elements in well-balanced, easily digestible form.

In making the famous wheat and barley food, the malting of the barley brings out the diastase (the digestive ferment) which converts the starch, during 20-hour baking breaks down the starch cells of the grains. Thus Grape-Nuts does not tax the digestion, but actually assists in the assimilation of other foods.

And Along Came Patty

By Mary Gertrude Sheridan

(Copyright, 1916, by W. G. Chapman.)

"Nothing will ever mend it!" sobbed Eunice Jarvis.

"Most what?" questioned her friend and confidant, Mrs. Almie Tresham.

"My broken heart!" was the wailing response.

"Nonsense! Why, child, you are making a mountain out of a molo hill. Young men must have their swing. Mr. Tresham himself, sedate and well behaved as he is now, was a positive chevalier before I married him."

"I despise flirting!" flashed out Eunice.

"And your affianced lover, Roy Porter, has been flirting, has he?"

"Abominable. And worse!" pronounced Eunice severely. "He is down at Beach Point, where I went for rest, he claimed. I have some friends there. They say that he has the own chief occupation of a dashing young lady whom nobody knows. They are out astonishing most of the time. They are almost inseparable. They take long, secret motor trips. Oh, my!" and fair Eunice broke down in tears.

"Why don't you write to him and call him to time?" suggested Mrs. Tresham.

"Oh, never that! I'd wear my heart smaller pieces should he refuse me."

"Well, Eunice," spoke her friend soberly, "you should have encouraged my brother Tom. He would have been a dear friend I have told you about," spoke Mrs. Tresham.

"Tom, you mean, girlie dear!" and impulsive Patty took Eunice by the arms and kissed her on both cheeks and then on the other, and Eunice blushed at the thought of permitting a kiss to pass between herself and Tom, only got a few minutes to spare. You see, I am acting as chauffeur for Mr. Porter and his lady friend. I brilled the garage man to let me do it. They have a little business affair, I suppose, at a farm house near here, and I ran down to ask you two to keep a secret."

"A secret!" repeated Mrs. Tresham, interested.

"A secret!" echoed Eunice, apprehensively.

"Yes. Oh, you dear little goose! Patty addressed herself to Eunice. "Why, this mysterious Miss Lay is in reality Mrs. Dabey. She has a crippled husband and they adore each other. He was a wife to come down to this district to straighten out some affairs in an estate he inherited. A good friend of Mr. Porter recommended him as a capable lawyer, and Mr. Porter gave him his first fee—a thousand dollars. He wants to surprise you, hence his absence in disguise."

"Oh, how I have wronged dear, dear Roy!" wailed Eunice, in a tempest of tears.

In propria persona, along came Patty the next morning.

Fresh as a daisy, bright as a dewdrop, sweet and winsome, but with a happy sparkle in her eyes, her first query of Mrs. Tresham was:

"Where is Walter?"—and that told the story.

Dome of St. Paul's.

The origin of the famous dome of St. Paul's, which has puzzled London architects for many generations, appears to have been solved by experts of the Royal Asiatic society. They say it was copied from the fourteenth century wooden dome of the Great Mosque at Damascus. This is has had a pagan origin, distinctive by indicated by its large and early "bulbous" shape. The Asiatic conqueror, sacked Damascus, at the close of the fourteenth century, he carried the idea of the Great Mosque back to Asia. The dome appears in Persia, and appeared in India in the sixteenth century. The Persians covered their domes with glazed tiles, which sometimes ran be seen flashing in the sunlight. The Turkish dome bowed how a really large dome would be, and it was a square matter with a problem the Romans failed to solve.

Daylight-Saving Scheme.

Considerable attention is now being given throughout Canada to a so-called daylight-saving scheme. The movement in Halifax is in accord with an effort all over the Dominion to have the clocks put back one hour on April 1 each year, continuing in some instance month, in order to give more daylight for work and pleasure. Meetings have been held all over Canada with a view to bringing the matter to the attention of the federal parliament at its next session. The Halifax committee is composed of representatives of the city council, trades and labor council, and wholesale and retail merchants.

He Saw It All.

There is nothing new in the matter with the "lamps" of an aged Southerner who lives in a little village. "Do you have some good lookers here," was his comment. "But I saw a lot of them coming into the hotel the other night with lots of silk dragging that the most depraved and the most wanton flirtations and have been almost as successful as the various black-and-white combinations so popular.

Two of the latter, as pictured here, are good examples of the success of black and white in entire coverings for parasols.

In the black one at the left of the picture, the backs of white silk are set in with hemstitching in heavy white silk. It adds immensely to the attraction of the bands.

The parasol of black-and-white stripe bordered with plain black probably stands at the head of the list of popular favorites. It looks well with any costume and is as sparkling as the summer sunshine.

It is a good idea to try the effect of colored silk in the complexion before making a choice of one. Red, white or black and white are safe—they always throw a pretty light upon the skin.

JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

"Why Don't You Write to Him?"

dropped him for Roy. I am sure he would never cause you any jealousy."

Distressed as Eunice was, the suggestion was too delicious.

"Oh, my, no—dear old Walter? He's good as gold, but he never thought of me in any way except as his sister's friend. Why, Walter and I spent the rare bird egg or a new butterfly specimen then he does for all the women in the world. But Roy—oh, it's hard to lose faith in him after we were so happy! And Flodie Fisher, her friend's shoulder, the latter try to console her and sympathize. They are way I was copied from the fourteenth century wooden dome of the Great Mosque at Damascus. This is has had a pagan origin, distinctive by indicated by its large and early "bulbous" shape. The Asiatic conqueror, sacked Damascus, at the close of the fourteenth century, he carried the idea of the Great Mosque back to Asia. All Sorts of Neckpieces

Favorite Fashions in Parasols

As varied as the flowers of the field, and as gay, your parasol this season may be of any shape or color you choose. If you incline to a plain one color design, then select one of the new shapes—a panda parasol or one of those fat, Chinese-looking affairs.

These shapes and the small umbrella style, like those shown in the picture, are designed to display the green, cerise, blue, tan, and other colors, bordered with black-and-white stripes or with Black-and-white checkerboard borders. Black-and-white checkerboard silks have been used with full effect on both white and colored umbrellas. Vivid green, bordered with black-and-white stripes, and a darker green with a wide band of livoden ribbon inserted, are among the most attractive and the most useful designs and have been almost as successful as the various black-and-white combinations.

Hair Decorations.

Ostrich tips are appearing once more in fashionable hair ornaments but perhaps the most striking of hair ornament revivals is the big Russian comb. It is not becoming to everyone, but where it is becoming it is extraordinarily piquant, and it is considered by evidence this summer.

One of the new ideas in connection with it is a comb whose high top is formed entirely of plaitings of fine black ribbons, held by lines of tiny rhinestones almost in the form of the angora collar shown here is finished with an ermine tail and head, and lies flat.

The ostrich boa in white and black, at all sides, is a fine, full and matching the suit, cannot be said, to take second place although it followed the sensation of fur in popular favor. Just now it is to more general demand than any fur hugged the fabrics of above nine out of ten of the ostrich boas are shown and fashioned with long tassels of narrow silk braid. Nestling in the long and dainty fibers are beautiful millinery roses in a small cluster, or a single rose and bud shown off to wonderful advantage so placed. These ruffs are fastened with tassels hanging at the back. Occasionally a short neckpiece of white marabou is seen, but the longer fine of the ostrich makes it the favorite.

Besides furs and feathers there are the colors of mallows and sets made in variety so great that everyone may be suited.

GREAT EMPIRE'S FLAG

COMBINATION REPRESENTED IN THE GERMAN BANNER.

Council Appointed to Select Suitable Emblem Had a Hard Task—Prussian Delegates Finally Settled the Question.

When the present German empire was established by uniting the several German states into one realm, the question arose as to what flag the new empire should fly. As it happened, each state wanted its own special standard adopted, and no two of them were alike, though as a general thing each was composed of two colors; thus Prussia had black and white, Bavaria blue and white, Saxony green and white, and every other state, no matter how small, possessed a flag.

When the great German empire became an established fact, naturally it was necessary to adopt a banner that would be distinctive, and include all the states, at every government isolated on being represented. A council was appointed to take charge of the whole matter, and the difficulty it encountered in coming to a decision will be better appreciated when it is remembered that there were at least 49 combinations to be made, if all were to be satisfied with the arrangement.

The larger states, the kingdoms, presided that their flags should be united and thus form the national flag, but the delegates from the small principalities decided so strongly to the ignoring of their claims to recognition that this plan was voted down. Another proposition was that all the states should be represented on one jack or corner of the flag, and have a series of stripes, each representing the five colors of larger states. This was also rejected as too complicated and unsatisfactory. Then it was suggested to have each state, large or small, represented in the field of the flag, a method of portioning out the surface in squares, so much to each state. This was convenient and inartistic plan was also rejected.

The Prussian delegates, however, met prepared a combination of colors, and, of course, black and white were not cast aside. The idea was to adopt a flag composed of black and white and red, as this latter had always been considered an imperial color. The other kingdoms objected fiercely to the predominance of the black and white, for Prussia, the blue and white and green and white of Bavaria and Saxony, but the Prussian delegates found allies in those from the smaller states, who, recognizing that there was no hope of having the flags of their own little states adopted, felt willing to have the claims of the larger overbearing states ignored, as well as their own, so they voted with the Prussians, and the black, white and red was accepted.

Then again, the smaller kingdoms insisted that each should keep its own flag to fly at the head of its own particular contingent in the army. This proposition was voted down, as it was decided it would give valuable information to an enemy as to the number of troops a great minister to war times. Another proposition, that of hanging black, red and white pennants to the staff, was decided adversely, on the ground that the red, white and blue stripes of the French flag, being hung in that manner, the tri flags might be confused in the midst of battle. This ended the question, and the Prussian flag, with the addition of the imperial red, was adopted as the national standard of the whole German empire.

Negro Ministrelsy Is Dying.

Other nations may have disputed the claim to the invention of the steamboat and the telegraph, but negro minstrelsy is as indisputably for America as American telephones and telephone itself. Here in the United States it had its birth, became popular, here it expanded and flourished for half a century, and then it was carried to Great Britain, where it established itself for many seasons; from here it made sporadic excursions into France and into Germany; and here at last it has fallen into a decline and a degeneracy and a decay which seem to forge it to a quick extinction. Its life was little longer than that vouchsafed to man, three score years and ten, for it was born in the fifth decade of the nineteenth century and in the second decade of the twentieth it lingers superfluous on the stage, with none to do it reverence.—Brander Matthews in Scribner's Magazine.

Trout Drowns a Muskrat.

Late Manhattan, one of Baltimore's best anglers, went up Spring creek and while whipping the stream he saw a lively commotion on the other side of the creek, says a dispatch to the Washington Post from Bellefonte. In the gathering twilight it was hard to distinguish what it was, but he finally made out a muskrat and a trout which he knew, was two feet long.

The rat managed to get hold on the trout and drew the trout with it but the fish flopped around hanging on to the rat's nose until it finally flopped back into the water. Within a few minutes the commotion died down and the trout swam away, leaving the muskrat a lifeless body on the creeks bottom.

"FIRST LADY" IS WELL EQUIPPED FOR DISTINCTION

Mrs. Robert Lansing Has Grace, Charm and All Social Accomplishments.

PROMOTION MEETS APPROVAL

New Secretary of State, Besides Being Lawyer and Diplomat, Golfs and Fishes and Is Baseball Fan—Protege of Former Secretary Foster.

Washington.—With the appointment by President Wilson of Robert Lansing as secretary of state, the figure of Mrs. Lansing begins to loom large upon the social horizon of Washington, for the wife of the president is, except Mrs. Wilson, the most prominent personage, and soon the less in this instance that Mrs. Lansing is a bit of a personage in her own right. As the daughter of John W. Foster, some time secretary of state, she has had large experience of official life here and abroad, and she is thoroughly versed in the customs of Washington society and fitted to assume the role of leader of the official contingent.

Since the retirement of William J. Bryan there has been a tendency to speak of Mrs. Bryan as "the social arbiter" of Washington officialdom and, since Mrs. Wilson's death, "first lady of the land" besides ignoring entirely the existence of Mrs. Thomas Riley Marshall, wife of the vice-president, who by all the canons of official etiquette is entitled to this distinction, and of Miss Margaret Wilson, the president's daughter, who unofficially and from the point of view of sentiment may be so regarded, this is making a claim for social leadership that Mrs. Bryan has never cared to advance.

Experienced in Social Life.

A woman whose interests center entirely in her husband and in her family, and who is inclined to agree with her husband that the social side of statecraft is of small consequence, Mrs. Bryan has been only too glad to avail herself of the official mourning for Mrs. Wilson to refrain from all entertaining not absolutely necessary and to evade as much social responsibility as possible. Moreover, although intelligent, cultivated and traveled, Mrs. Bryan, until her husband entered the cabinet, had scant knowledge of official life, Mr. Bryan's own experience having been limited to a term or two in congress.

In contrast to Mrs. Bryan, Mrs. Lansing has had wide and intimate experience of life in the great capitals of Europe, and her long residence in Washington has familiarized her with the peculiar social problems of the place and with the far-reaching effects of the social side of diplomacy and statecraft.

Diplomat by Profession.

Mr. Lansing is a diplomat by profession and by long practice. He inherits his diplomatic training under his father-in-law. He is reputed to have handled more diplomatic business—just plain business, in the form of arbitrations—as counsellor for governments and in related capacities than any contemporary American. He knows the methods, the manners and the forms of diplomacy, and is particularly informed upon the intimate details now pressing upon his department, having had opportunity to familiarize himself with them during his service as counsellor of the state department.

It is significant that the man in the street was obliged when Mr. Lansing first came into prominence to inquire as to his politics. The answer is that he is a Democrat, but in no way a politician, and his appointment is a step toward divorcing foreign relations from domestic political concerns. He stands for the professional view that the nation needs a foreign policy that shall be continuous and logical and not disturbed by political shifts.

Always Keeps His Temper.

Without possessing the imaginative in physical appearance to even a remote degree, Mr. Lansing has much the personality of Lincoln. He has the war president's ability always to keep his temper, to speak his mind instantly in simple, homely, but correct English, to withhold information, if he will, but being troubled or embarrassed in the act, and to maintain a serene, judicious mind while all around is hurrying and shouting and the whole world seems about to plunge into ruin.

On exterior, his office, in the state, war and navy building, one meets a man of large figure, primarily, gray—he is fifty-one years old—but undoubtedly handsome. His eyes are excessively fine, and his face lights up in a way that is irresistible.

To questions he replies instantly and crisp with trenchant humor. There is no sidestepping. He looks straight at his questioner and if the query is improper he does it with without stumbling. His emotions are under complete control.

These qualities have endeared him to the Washington correspondents, who didn't get along at all well with Mr. Bryan. Mr. Lansing's request—not an order—that no foreign dispatches be accosted by questioners in the state, war and navy building has been uniformly carried out, indeed a correspondent who violated it would become a pariah to his fellows here. The correspondents know the new counsel of the secretary of state and he also will do the right thing by them out of his desire to preserve the Mr. Lansing's own standard.

The members of the diplomatic corps and Mr. Lansing is of the best type of old world courtiers and they treasure him accordingly.

They know Mr. Lansing understands their troubles and difficulties thoroughly. Mr. Lansing and his wife's father, John W. Foster, secretary of state under Harrison and United States envoy to several countries, make their home here together. The son-in-law has absorbed great stores of diplomatic lore from the man who is popularly called "the old fox of American diplomacy."

Rose by Sheer Ability.

Mr. Foster will be eighty years old next year. He was a lieutenant colonel in the Civil war, minister to Mexico for seven years, then minister to Russia and minister to Spain. He has served on many very important international commissions and has acted officially for China and Mexico. Several of his books are standard. He is a leading peace advocate.

Mr. Foster had much to do with introducing his brilliant son-in-law to official Washington, but Mr. Lansing's rise to fame has been through sheer ability and hard work. He was born in the small city of Watertown, N. Y., October 17, 1864, the son of an eminent lawyer and the descendant of many men who have been leaders in New York state history. John Lansing (representing New York in the constitutional convention of 1787 at Philadelphia, served in the Revolution and was inter-chancellor of the state of New York.

Mr. Lansing was graduated from Amherst college in 1886 and began the practice of law with his father in Watertown in 1889.

He soon became too big for small town litigation, however, and his national law was his forte. In 1892 he was appointed associate counsel for the United States in the fur seal arbitration and he attended the sessions of the International Court in Paris in 1893.

In the course of the next two years he was counsel for the Mexican and Chinese legations in Washington and in 1896 Secretary of State Olney appointed him counsel for the government before the Bering sea claims commission.

He was counsel for private parties before the Canadian joint high commission in 1898-99 and later again served the Mexican and Chinese governments.

In 1903 he was appointed to be counsel for the United States before the Alaskan boundary tribunal and he took a prominent part in the Venezuelan asphalt dispute in 1905. He represented the government in the Alaska fisheries and arbitration in 1909 and in 1911, on his return to this country from the league, he was made technical delegate of the government in the fur seal conference at Washington.

In 1911 he acted as counsel for the United States in the American and British claims arbitration and this was his work up to the date he was chosen as Secretary Bryan's right hand man.

Appointment Popular.

The appointment is very popular with the members of the diplomatic corps, who have been associated with Mr. Lansing in an official way for a good many years, and among whom he numbers many close personal friends. No sooner was his appointment made known than the foreign envoys in Washington hastened to call upon him to offer congratulations and pay their respects, the Japanese ambassador, Viscount Chinda, being one of the first.

Mr. Lansing's appointment also meets the approval of his colleagues of the cabinet.

Incidentally it may be added that he is a golfer, a fisherman, a baseball fan, a landscape painter and draftsman and writes verse.

Nothing New.

"These Greek letter societies are a queer lot. They have many things which are taboo, mustn't be touched." "I see nothing strange about that. It is the same principle on which we carefully glue a lot of grass for people to keep off of."

English economists have declared that America's wealth grows $1,000,000,000 a year. Since the official estimate of our national wealth three years ago exceeds $175,000,000,000, this total today must now have passed between the $200,000,000,000 point. These figures are colossal beyond all compare. They mean $2,000 of wealth for every inhabitant. They represent more than double the wealth of the United Kingdom our closest competitor, and they very nearly match the combined wealth of England, France and Germany.

Our wealth is ten times that of Italy, eight times that of Austria, and four times that of France. These leading European countries are now tearing at one another's vitals, and destroying physically much faster than they can create it. Hence all Europe is today actually moving backward, while the United States is swooping swiftly forward to a state of still great opulence. Here is the land of plenty, of peace and of opportunity.—Philadelphia Ledger.

As Mars Goes By.

This is war:

Along the white road rippling away eastward over the divided country the army motors were pouring by in endless lines broken now and then with the dark mass of a tramping regiment or the clatter of a train of artillery. In the intervals between these waves of military traffic we had the road to ourselves, except for the flashing past of dispatch bearers on motor cycles and on hideously hooting little motors carrying gaudy officers in gaunt[illegible] and woolen buttons.—Edith Wharton in Scribner's Magazine.

Modern War Munitions.

It takes three months to make a shrapnel shell. Such a projectile has the form of a cylinder, which, by the help of a time fuse, blows its head off as the instant desired, scattering 250 or more lead bullets. The smallest size used by the United States for the three-inch gunnemach gunn, as well as howitzers are employed for firing shrapnel—costs $9.

SOME ANTIDOTES FOR POISON

Worth Preserving, Since Quick Action is the All-Important Point to Be Considered.

The first thing to do in case of poisoning is to summon a physician without delay, telling him what has happened, so that he may bring a stomach pump and other necessities with him.

The next thing to do is to give the patient an emetic. The sooner and more complete the vomiting, the better chance for recovery. Whatever is given should be repeated and repeated until complete nausea empties the stomach.

If there is a tendency to drowsiness, the patient must be kept awake by exercise.

When it is not known what poison has been taken, follow these directions:

Mix in a pitcher of warm water two heaping teaspoonfuls of common salt and one teaspoonful of mustard to each pint of water. Give glassful after glassful until vomiting is severe.

Also give the whites of two or three eggs or a cupful of strong black coffee.

Carbolic Acid—Traces of weak alcohol or of ammonia, if the patient can swallow. Stomach pump as soon as possible.

Oxalic Acid—Magnesia or chalk and water in large doses, repeated frequently.

Ammonia — Vinegar in frequent doses.

Opium or Laudanum — Emetic of mustard and water; keep the patient in motion and use a stomach pump as soon as possible. Also give strong black coffee.

Iodine—Magnesia; or better, freshly prepared hydrated oxide of iron.

Corrosive Sublimate—White of eggs mixed with water until patient vomits freely.

Saltpeter—Mustard and water. Afterward give mucilage and small doses of castor oil.

Oil of Vitriol or Aqua Fortis—Large doses of magnesia and water.

In our country, however, remedies while waiting for the arrival of a physician.

DULLED BY MONEY-GRUBBING

Writer's Criticisms of the Relations of Most Middle-Class Fathers to Their Families.

Someone has said that "the great effort of civilization up to date has been attaching the family to the family," writes Mary Ware Dennett in the Century. Very likely, but in many ways the attachment has been bad for him and bad for the family. It has developed in him a pernicious type of pride which has led him to deem women and children as possessions—a pride no less false when sugar-coated with sentimental or chivalrous talk of the "wife, or mother, my sister, my children" variety.

Men's families have been for the most part either a source of this false pride or else a millstone round their necks, sometimes both. Most middle-class men are hopelessly dulled and stupefied by mere grubbing to get the family bills paid. In the "wage-slave" class, both the man and the woman share the same stupid fate, the woman always getting the worst of it, however, for childbearing is added to her other labors. Men have been apt to assume that their responsibilities as women and children were wholly discharged by merely paying over cash, without much personal service. Both men and women have meant well, but the men have been further, perhaps, selfish and the women stupidly unselfish.

About the Moon.

Probably not one person in a thousand knows that when they see the moon of any city or community it is fried in a procession it is carried upside down. The glorified head, with its ornamented headwork, curlings, gilding and decoration, is really the bottom and not the top of the moon, for the narrow end which used to bear a spike is really the top, and is pointed when the king in present the moon is always carried with the small end upward.

The base, which started out by being only a small knob, has grown in years, both in size and ornateness, that it could not be carried comfortably in the hand. Hence the reason for the reversal was for greater ease, the heavier end or base was carried over the shoulder, and in course of time came to be looked upon as the top.

How to Pronounce "LL."

While learned professors may differ as to the correct pronunciation of Welsh, it is a comforting reflection that our language offers no obstacles equal to those which have to be surmounted by students of Welsh. One of Doctor Owen's predecessors in the See of St. David's who set about learning Welsh as soon as he was appointed bishop never succeed in mastering the guttural "ll." "I will tell you how to do it, my lord," was the reply. "Put the tip of your accusative tongue in the roof of your Episcopal mouth and then hiss like a gander."—London Chronicle.

Diamond Retains Luster.

Only the expert can detect an imitation diamond from a real stone when the imitation is new, but after the fake stone has been worn for a little time it soon loses its luster. It is the which makes a real diamond valuable. No matter how long it is worn it will keep its sparkle almost as well as ever.

Meets Painless Death.

A Vienna professor has announced the belief that a man who meets death suddenly by a bullet in the head feels absolutely no pain. Most particularly he thinks this true in the case of an officer who is shot while leading a charge with concentrated enthusiasm.

Uncle Eben Describes a Poet.

"The man dat won't tend to his own business," said Uncle Eben, "is always lookin' 'round fuh a chance to help somebody else."

... Secretary

REPORT OF THE SCHOOL BOARD, DISTRICT NO. 1, TOWNSHIP AND CITY OF CHARLEVOIX, TO THE ANNUAL MEETING.

July 12th, 1915.

In the past year the School Board has given special attention to the condition of the grounds and the exterior of the High School buildings, together with the grounds adjoining the Lincoln School. The grounds of the High School have been graded, the surplus soil being used on the grounds of the Central and High School buildings, which have been brought to a grade. The sidewalk on the Lincoln School grounds has been put in good condition, and the grounds have been twice seeded, once last summer and once this spring. We have also made a large number of improvements in the grounds with still more in view, the distances that with a revolving sprinkler only 25 feet of hose will be necessary to water the entire grounds. The tennis courts are now in good condition and put in first class shape and seems to supply a long felt want. A part of the grounds adjacent to the Lincoln School have been laid out for an athletic field and consideration work for the fitting of them for this purpose has been done. This is an improvement we hope that the state of our finances will allow such as to enable the Board to finish this work the coming year if in their judgment that is the proper thing to do. The balance of the ground has been used part for crops, and the rest was tilled and seeded to alfalfa. A good crop seemed to have been secured in the fall, but during the winter a large part of it winter killed. The problem of how best to use those grounds not needed for an athletic field is one that we commend to the care of the Board. In addition, to this, we have trimmed the trees, removing a few from the Central and High School yards. These improvements, as will be seen by the Secretary's report, have cost a considerable sum, but in our judgment, they were necessary and have tended to make a better appearance of the school grounds.

There is a very decided need of shade trees on the Lincoln School grounds. We do not think our finances would warrant the expenditure the past year. This matter, in our opinion, should have a ... the coming year.

The work done in the matter of the heating plant of the Central and High school buildings very thoroughly, and as none of the Board are expert heating engineers, we employed Dr. G. W. Bissell, Dean of the Engineering Department of the Michigan Agricultural College, an expert in heating and ventilation, to come to the place and advise us what was the proper thing to do. His report was published in the Charlevoix Courier of June 16, 1915. In accordance with this report, we have decided to retain the present boilers another year at least, and by changing the returns and converting all of the radiators to the indirect system, we believe we can get as good results as could be had in the work and to get a line on the question of their economy in the consumption of fuel. This contract for this work has already been let at the sum of $[illegible]. These changes will involve the necessity of ventilating through the windows until such time as the ... can be made, as a separate system of ventilation has to be installed. As such a system would involve an expense of not less than $2,000, it is our opinion that it will not be installed for some time unless the Legislature shall take it obligatory by law. Practical ventilating systems in all school buildings, which we put in contract and report to the Board at the regular meeting in June 1913, 1914, and 1915, all signed by the contractors and all the employees of the District. In February last, one of our janitors, Mr. Dolbey, tried to make the furnace to fall on an icy sidewalk near the Central Building, and break his arm. The Protective Insurance Company of Indianapolis, Indiana, very promptly gave a release to the claim and made a satisfactory adjustment. The total outlay on account of the accident was the sum of [illegible]. This amount the District would have had to pay had it not been for the Liability Insurance. The cost of the policy to the District for the past year was $[illegible].

The Fire Insurance on school property has also been re-adjustment and some increase made of it. A schedule of the amount of the insurance, how covering and by what agencies written, together with the cost of it was published in the proceedings of the Board, in the Charlevoix Courier.

At the last Annual meeting, considerable discussion was had on the question of the Bible in the public school, and action was taken at that time expressing the sentiment of the meeting as in favor of placing the Bible in the schools in a manner similar to that which is done in the city of Grand Rapids, Michigan. On investigation, we found that the Bible is not taught or read in the school rooms, but that the different churches have Bible classes, and arrangements are made by which the students in these classes get certain credits in their school markings. This subject was much discussed by the Board during the first third of the school year and prior thereto, but no solution of the problem along the lines above indicated, was found and consequently the Bible has had exactly the same treatment as it had before, namely, it has not been used in the schools nor has there been any connection made between the school system and the churches with reference to credits to the children in their school markings by reason of their study of the Bible.

The Library has claimed a fair amount of attention at the hands of the Board. With the very able efforts of the Librarian, with such co-operation as the Board felt at liberty to extend, attempts have been made to increase the Library and to serve the wants of the community generally. Particularly has the plan been followed of putting in publications, both books and periodicals and bulletins, covering the useful occupations of all kinds. In furtherance of this two different days have been set apart which have been called "Open Days," the intention being to bring in as many as possible during that day and to give them such information as they might wish with reference to what the Library is and how it might serve each particular individual. It has not yet reached the fullness of its usefulness but it has, ready for service, much that has not yet been realized by the great bulk of the population.

The matter of Manual Training has been before the Board for discussion and while they are individually favorable to it, we have not felt that we should incur the expense of making an attempt to seriously install the branch of school work without further consultation with the patrons of the school, and we are therefore taking the liberty of bringing the matter again to the attention of the electors of the District to ascertain whether the sentiment has changed since two years ago, or whether it is still the sense of the majority of the District that it is not desirable to introduce Manual Training in our schools as yet.

The schools themselves have been very successful. The Board feels that in the employment of Mr. H. A. Craig as Superintendent, no mistake was made. He has given the schools able, careful and conscientious supervision and has had the co-operation of a very efficient corps of teachers. The fact that the Charlevoix High School in the spelling contest between the high schools of East Jordan, Boyne City and Charlevoix, were victors, is a cause for congratulation, and we think is a fair indication of the kind of work which the schools have been doing the past year. There have been some changes in the teaching force for the ensuing year, but the vacancies caused by the resignation of the various teachers who have so have been filled with teachers of a character which promises excellent results for the coming year. In fact, the schools are prosperous and the outlook for the coming year is very gratifying.

Respectfully submitted,
BOARD OF EDUCATION,
E. J. HILKES.

WOULDN'T CONDEMN HIM YET

Mr. J. Fuller Gloom Was Willing to Give His Nephew the Benefit of the Doubt.

"From time to time various persons have tried to convince me that my nephew, St. Aubyn Page, is a poor, miserable wretch, but I simply haven't would do something about it," stated J. Fuller Gloom. "Among other things they pointed accusingly at the boy's name, but that argument did not impress me. The possession of a foolish name is usually more aimed against the parents and many of the mother's mothers of other days read Bertha M. Clay. The critics also mentioned his appetite, which has long been like that of a starving cormorant's, and his manners, received a majority of motherless. But, then, some worthy persons are afflicted with tapeworms and bad manners might have been due to a long-forgotten blow on the head.

"They referred to his habit of stopping dead in the middle of the highway and gaping at the passing cities, at the same time murmuring something about somebody that he seemed to think he had loved and lost while some or other unnamed hurtling cars, coming around the corner from the rear, rammed him, or caused him to spring out of the way so abruptly that he dislocated something. It appeared to be the consensus of opinion that he ought to either run over or be run over by a motor car, but I felt that if they don't hit him.

"Of course, all that would seem to be fairly convincing proof that he is a poet, but I am still willing to give him the benefit of the doubt. You see, I have read some of his rhymes.

RETURN TO NORMAL HEARING

Correspondent of New York Newspaper Tells of Good Results of Rubbing Scalp.

For some years I had been under the impression that washing the scalp or using tonics for the hair was bad, for the reason that it was thought to have a tendency to increase dandruff, and when I read your correspondent's letter on the treatment of dandruff by means of manipulation of the scalp and the use of rubber combs, I confess I was at first rather doubtful about the efficiency of the treatment. But I finally tried the plan of rubbing and to say that it brought surprising results, writes a correspondent of the New York Sun.

But what I cannot understand is why a wet scalp and rubbing should restore normal hearing. I cannot account for it. After the first time I discontinued the rubbing and use of the comb, with the result that the hearing gradually returned; and with the resumption of the treatment it was soon restored. For many years I could not hear ordinary conversation with my left ear, but with the use of the above treatment the hearing in that ear became normal.

It would be highly interesting to learn what explanation our specialists have for this phenomenon, and whether it can be utilized in the treatment of all cases of deafness, or whether it is only good for some special or particular cases. The Bible has long advised the use of coffee does not appear to be harmful in my own case.

TREADING THE BEATEN PATH

Mistake Made by Many Is to Think They Have Discovered All Things Along the Route.

Most of us grow weary at times of what we call the beaten path. We have tired in so often that we imagine we can see millepeds by heart and believe that with eyes and ears closed we could almost imagine we could tell in a moment our whereabouts. This may be true to a degree, but there is much to be learned even in every, and sometimes even to those who have lived there have neglected all the byways of the great path of life many times and yet unknown. It is really a question of our own ability to appreciate and use or not the opportunities which come to influence our individual lives. Of course, if we have an entire home bound attitude a purely worldly exercise we limit our opportunities to a very little. The highest degree, because material success is not everything in this world. It is very good, to be sure, and very satisfying in a way, but even those who are near enough to contribute to its many advantages are the first to admit that money is not the sum total of happiness. We must have an inner life, a consciousness of the existence of something better and higher than the material, and we should be ever really desire ourselves wholly blessed that our evolution is often made obtained by the man who has little or nothing of the world's blessings than by the more fortunate brothers who back in its smiles.

Dwindling Helgoland.

Helgoland in the North sea, the forbidden Gretna Green of Europe, is actually yielding to nature's forces. This famous island, held by England from 1807 to 1890, is 45 miles northwest of the mouth of the Elbe and Weser, and though it is a mere chalky rock it shows the sea and iron than a third of a mile in area, has acquired great importance as a German naval base. Attempts have been made to the fact that a man in the possession of the British Geological society shows that its circumference is now 200 to 170 yards. In 1200 the distance around it was 45 miles, and as early as 1649 it had been reduced in area to four square miles. Erosion by the sea has been the cause of the gradual diminution. The wearing away has been effected from the southeastern side, into which the sea has cut thirty miles of cliffs, and it is now feared by many to the set of the current, but also to the greater hardness of the rock still left.

Proper Care of the Eyes.

It is undoubtedly true that we do not have sufficient regard for our eyes. The eye is too delicate an organ, however, to be subjected to highhanded treatment. After the eyes have been very bright light to darkness should be avoided, and if the eye are 200 to 1 prevailing color in the room in which one spends most of his time should be some tint that is helpful to the eye sight.

Do not read while lying down, when rocking or when in a car. Do not use the eyes for a long period of time on a road or sow in the sun, but let a good strong light fall over your right shoulder. Most children are born with a tendency to squint with the eyes, and do not bend over your book or paper.

An Excess Weight Shipment

By Florence Lillian Henderson

"Consignment excess weight one hundred and twenty pounds." announced Joe Morris, general utility man in the establishment of the Wayne Co., jobbers in broom corn.

It was not so large or prepossessing a house that such a discrepancy could pass unnoticed. Paul Wayne and his old maid sister, Alice, were working hard to establish the little business, inherited to run down by their cantankerous uncle, who had willed it to them. Their working capital was limited. They purchased small selected lots only, the loyal adherence of old customers just about enabled them to make a living, with the hope of some day extending the business.

"Call back the driver," ordered Paul.

"Gone, sir." It was one of our own wagons. He just unhitched and rode away. When we came to unload we found—her!"

The speaker with a quick smile stepped aside and pushed into sight a young girl.

At her Paul Wayne stared in wonder. His sister, looking up from her bookkeeping, fairly gasped. "Her, the stowaway, the excess weight, stood brushing the straws and dust from a neat but creased dress. She looked rather maned than embarrassed. She was not bold, yet there was a latent defiance in her face.

It was a charming face, innocent, smiling, yet daring. She was not more than seventeen years of age, perfect girlish artlessness marked her demeanor.

"Why!" spoke Paul in a bewildered way, "what does this mean?"

"Fair union between two babes when we found her," resorted Morris. "Wonder she wasn't crushed."

The girl flashed her eyes across all those in the little office, meanwhile arranging her loose braids of hair.

At Her Paul Wayne Stared in Wonder.

She expected an inquisition and suddenly assumed a demure and composed attitude. Miss Alice looked severe, then, certainly, was a raw, sweet girl. Her social status it was difficult to determine.

"A girl tramp!" whispered Miss Alice awesomely to herself, and shuddered. Her brother waved Morris away from the office. Then he crossed and curtsously placed a chair for the culprit.

"Sit down, please," he said. "How did you come to be in that load of corn?"

"I crept into it last night," said the girl pointedly, as if acknowledging the most commonplace act in the world. "You see, I was lost, it was raining and I was sleepy. I'd kept away from people as much as I could.

"Why?" challenged Miss Alice, sharply.

"Because I didn't want to be caught."

"Who by?"

"The people I had run away from," stated the girl, frankly. "Now, I want to stay with you. I'll work and pay I'd go back, and if you want to know my name it's Garnet Page."

Then she blushed, colored down as she saw not only interest but pity on the faces before her. "Please let me my way."

"My child!" spoke Miss Alice, "have you had nothing to eat since you left in that wagon?"

"Only a few cake crumbs," replied Garnet. "I'm not hungry, I'm used to food—yes, and to ride on the railroad, when I get—safe.

"Come with me, my dear," said Alice, and she led the way to their living rooms in the office.

Garnet, fed and tidied up, looked refreshed and happy as she sat down back to the office half an hour later. "Uncle Jim, I want you to do with this wilful child!" inquired Miss Alice. "She insists she is right in leaving relatives who have no parents. She is going to the city, she says, to make her own living!"

"Big! I want so go to work," declared the girl, with a stamp of her foot and—and other things."

Paul Wayne regarded her seriously. Every pastime moment he felt the strange power of her personality. Notice in every direction was taken of her. The help of a time fuse, blows its head off in the air after a month's practice. Instead Garnet. I can pay my way until I learn, and further I am not afraid of the city. I can mind my own business and make others mind theirs. Why, say," and she sidled up coaxingly to Miss Alice, "this is a delightful place. I'd love dearly to stay here. Can't you give me work? You know, and a roguish gleam came into her mischievous eyes, "I am the overweight the one hundred and twenty pounds of broom straw you didn't get. Let me work it out, won't you?"

Her bright, pleasing eyes were irresistible. Even the face of Miss Alice softened. The girl had placed a confiding hand on the arm of Paul. Despite himself he thrilled. He had never thought much of female society. He began at that intense moment of life life.

Vainly brother and sister tried to draw out their guest as to her former home and friends.

"Home!" she repeated sadly. "I have none. Friends? They were my enemies. They tried to force me to marry a man I detest. That's why I ran away. And I'm going to stay run away," added Garnet resolutely. "Can't I work here? I don't care for the pay. I only want to please you and be among friends.

There was no other way but her way. She called them friends, and such they indeed became. Garnet wound herself about the lives and hearts of those two lonely people. She became the joy of the little household, always smiling, willing and busy, and singing half the time like a lark.

It became a joy to brother and sister to note how Garnet settled down into a helpful, practical little woman, for all her mirth and girlishness. She was happy, contented, interested in the business and in anything that appertained to the welfare of those two cherished friends.

She was an earnest, thoughtful listener to their business plans one evening, her face reflected the seriousness of her employer. Paul was troubled. An opportunity to purchase a large consignment of broom corn at a very low price was offered. The bank had declined to advance the one thousand necessary and he had not the capital personally to swing the deal.

"She has run away!" startled Paul the next morning to his sister's excited tones, and so it seemed, and his heart sank. Garnet was gone. She had left in the night.

Two days later she burst upon them, aflame with joy. She had placed before her employer a little package.

There is the thousand dollars. I loan it to you. I give it to you, if you will take it. Oh! please don't look so wondering. I simply raised the money on my diamonds!"

"Your diamonds!" gasped Miss Alice, aghast.

"Yes, that my dead mother left me. They have always been mine, although her estate is still in the hands of guardians. If you don't take the money, I shall cry!"

They had to take it, to be returned in a month. Then, later still, one morning, Garnet came into the office to throw her arms around dear Miss Alice and kiss her.

"I am sixteen today!" she cried. "That means I am free. Now they can't make me marry that horrid man! Now they can't keep my fortune any longer. Oh, my dear! think of it! I can give you splendid people all the capital needed to build up the grandest business in the world!"

And she told her simple story of unscrupulous guardians. In vain Miss Alice told her that their humble home was no place for a rich heiress, that their could not her marry.

"You shan't! torn out, sobbed Garnet. "I will have my way! Why, your brother marry me, if he cares so much to keep me—for I love him. I love him dearly!"

There was a tumble at the doorway. Wayne's face was flushed as he regarded her.

Garnet rushed his extended arms to hide her happy, blushing face.

Emersonian Philosophy.

We are not what we seem to have already long had the praise of men, and do not perceive that anything man can do may be directly done. We think ourselves satisfied or dissatisfied with certain acts or persons officers or occasions, and do not see that we are only what we have virtue from extent and Emersonian philosophy. That organization, born in the cotton fields of Texas, has grown to a mighty power in the United States and now seemingly it deals with every question in which the welfare of the farmer is involved. Its activities in the interest of the American plowman. When that convention is called to order every farmer in America should pause and bow his head in honor of the men gathered there to form a patriotic and unselfish service to agriculture

11,000,000 SEE THE "MOVIES" DAILY

By J. C. JESSEN

Staff Correspondent of the Motion Picture News

CONSTRUCTED SETTING FOR SCENE IN NEW YORK CAFÉ TO

SCENE IN A PROPERTY ROOM

OPEN AIR STAGE SCENE SHOWING TWO CAMERAMEN AT WORK

WITH one of every ten persons in the United States now daily attending motion pictures, the form of entertainment can truly be termed the universal amusement. The films constitute the program of more than 20,000 themed theaters in this country attended by 11,000,000 people daily, and the good army of pleasure-seekers does not represent any one, but every class of American citizen, old and young, rich and poor, the blighters and the untutored.

The gigantic amusement purveying organization reflects the investment of more than a billion dollars in the business. Of this the major share by far and fully one-third of that amount is expended annually for the making of films. More than 6,000 reels of the motion pictures of the world are produced in United States, and of these 10 per cent are made in and about Los Angeles, now known as the photoplay stage of the world.

Put in matters concerned with the production of motion picture features is more sentimental than the fact that the presentday system of distributing and showing the films has been established and developed to a state of perfection in a period of less than ten years. Only in the first entertainment world was such activity, there were but a few places where vaudeville could be rented, and the number of theaters devoted to showing motion pictures exclusively could almost be counted on your fingers.

Invention of motion pictures can partially be attributed to a California incident. Two rancheros were arrested as to whether a horse, while running had more than two feet on the ground at any time. To solve this, 24 cameras were stretched across the track and the end of each attached to a separate camera. A horse ran down the stretch breaking each thread separately and exposing 24 photographic plates. One of the men took copies of the photographs to Europe where they caused numerous experiments. Finally the task of making motion pictures was given up because no flexible substitute for glass could be found.

Years later a New Jersey minister, trying to discover a way of making nonbreakable serving tissue under for use in his Sunday school, made the discovery that celluloid was suitable. The enterprise was abandoned, but a photographic supply manufacturer, which enabled Thomas Edison, the wizard, to produce the first celluloid film. first shown at Columbian exposition, Chicago in 1893. Forty feet of ribbon film with sprocket holes on each side and just the size to a lantern slide, with an intermittent movement that retained each picture before the people twice as long as it required to move the picture to the next one, was the result. It was an electric light and directly in front of the lens a small lens through which the people could see for the sum of five cents. The film had sprocket holes to the number of 1,000 and a corresponding number was placed on the rollers.

This device arrived as an idea for Robert W. Paul of London, the firm of Lumiere & Sons of Paris and a man named Grey of New York city. Simultaneously they thought of attaching the film to a stereopticon lamp and projecting the picture on a screen, and Paul began working out machines which would do this properly. The first projected motion picture in America was that of Corbett and Fitzsimmons, shown in a concert room in New York city in 1895. Paul perfected the projecting machine in 1896, and Lumiere in 1897. At a later date, William Kennedy Laurie Dickson, the film man for Edison, developed the Edison kinetoscope. This device was a combination of the vitascope of Lumiere and a machine with rolls of the film introduced by Lumiere, a more perfected sprocket movement for the film clearance, and a powerful lamp perfected by Thomas Edison. Other experiments were made in Europe about the same time, but later patent rights were all merged with that of the Edison. The projection machine was crude, and it has received much time and mechanical ingenuity to bring it to its present state of perfection.

With machines made, a still greater problem of securing new interesting subjects confronted the showmen who took up the novelty. There being no completed motion pictures for sale, it was necessary for each exhibitor to make his own subjects. No one thought of making pictures of plays. Instead, they caught fleeting of races, scenes in prize fights, and topical events of a sensational nature.

About this time a Kansas City operator of these machines learning of the projecting machine, made plans for a concession at the Buffalo Pan-American exposition, which consisted of a railway illusion made possible by rocking the coach while pictures were projected on a screen in one end of the car. Later this was extended throughout the country in a specially constructed railroad coach, and the name, Blake's Tour of the World Express, came.

The greatest step of the industry following the production of pictures of more than one reel was made simultaneously by Miles Brothers of New York and Raymes Views of Chicago. They established film markets or exchanges, where negatives were bought and prints sold or rented. This system served to solve the problem of distribution, by renting films to exhibitors, for this method is successful today throughout the world.

The exchange system assured a permanent film supply to exhibitors and stereocons were converted into theaters in all parts of the country. In less than two years more than ten thousand motion theaters were opened in the United States. The number in New York city alone totaled more than 1,200 January 1, 1907, and in Chicago there were 300 of a mushroom growth.

Many motion picture producing plants were established in many cities, and the film supply proved abundant for the rapidly increasing number of theaters. But there was no system to the production, the making of prints, preparing advertising matter for exhibitors, or giving heed to what is today considered the most important phase of the business—that of arranging a well-balanced program.

Manufacturers saw the necessity of not only making the subjects, but also maintaining their own system of exchanges for the purpose of safeguarding their own interests by controlling the prints, and secured their interests in releasing companies. Now there are no less than ten corporations composed of owners of producing companies that have national releasing systems, with exchanges in all principal cities. These are capitalized in the millions and one is reputed to have made a profit one year of a million dollars, while others have operated continuously at a loss.

With the formation of big releasing companies and the general improvement of conditions of the industry, with regard to all phases, the investment in it now runs into the millions of people of the United States who daily witness the showing of motion pictures, it was the great chance for the betterment of production, and the realization by the manufacturers of the possibilities of photoplays.

In the standardization of the film the celluloid strip was gradually reduced to afte from one having a picture two inches wide and one and one-half inches deep, to one having a picture three-fourths of an inch deep by one inch in width. There are sixteen pictures in each foot of film, or 16,000 to a reel of 1,000 feet, which when properly projected, 1 frame or picture to the second, 16 to the minute. Few people know that every minute approximately one thousand pictures are thrown upon the screen, each one separated from the adjoining one by a hair line of the thickness of an average cutting card.

Still arrangement of the film that allows a short interval between the time the pictures are hidden from view of the audience and the screen is dark, thus giving the effect of a revolving fan wheel or shutter passing in front of the projecting lens, each picture is advanced from one picture to another by the intermittent sprocket movement. A thousand feet of film which passes through the projecting machine is stationary three-fourths of the eighteen minutes required in projecting it and a motion but approximately four and a half minutes. This prevents blurring of the pictures and makes each individual picture appear sharp from point of focus. The pictures are magnified from two to four hundred times upon the screen, the size being determined by the size of the screen, distance from the projecting machine and the lens itself.

The making of motion pictures is most interesting to the layman of the motion picture fans. Only in the schools and colleges and the time is not important part of the equipment of our schools, the universities and many schools of the large cities now having adopted this means of teaching.

Motion pictures, fifteen years ago a novelty, ten years ago a feature added to vaudeville programs, now a regular part of the program, because they constituted the last number of the entertainment, and today they are the main feature, not serve as amusement to the greatest number of people. They have reached, in the number of people, from 2 to 4 million, and the prices are now twenty cents for adults, dramas and musical shows of the significant state in a majority of the best theaters of the large cities, and by their universal popularity have become known as the American amusement.

HAVE TO SAMPLE THE BEDS

Nitrate Industry in Chile Would Seem to be Something Resembling Game of Chance.

Great as the nitrate industry of Chile is, the ore beds themselves are seldom of rich size. Generally they spread over large areas. Occasionally the ore is found within a foot or two of the surface, and at other times it is 50 feet deep. There is nothing regular or systematic in the occurrence of the products, which are scattered about so that each small area must be sampled and worked with little relation to other deposits. Outside are left the miners, who have to blast the ground and sort and cord up the ore. Other contractors load and transport the material. Then it is sent all and resold on a basis of the value of the material, but a contractor may run into less ground and abandon that land particular working. Before the mining of any particular area can be decided upon it is necessary to sample it thoroughly and the question always arises as to how thoroughly the sampling is to be done—that is, how close holes first, after which the ground is tested with powder or low-power dynamite. The idea is merely to break the ground enough so that the nitrate will come out in big chunks. It is not but enough to pulverize the nitrate rock, for the ore is easily broken with hammers, the larger the pieces result. Long in the blasting from the blast, the less the loss done by hand, the holes are made large enough to contain a good charge of black gunpowder near the bottom of the hole. When air drills are used it is necessary to spring the holes first, after which the ground is tested with powder or low-power dynamite. FIND LOOT HIDDEN 35 YEARS

Recalls to Old Inhabitant Indian Massacre of Early Days in New Mexico.

Leo Williams, a prominent cattleman of the Mimbres valley, and one of his assistants, Jack Kerr, were scouting around in the Goodnight mountains adjoining the cattle ranch of J. G. Kerr at Florida Station, 17 miles northeast of Deming, N. M., when they saw under the ledge of a rock the end of a bolt of calico. They immediately procured tools and commenced to dig and were rewarded for their efforts by finding a regular drygoods store.

Subsequent to the visit of Williams and Reynolds an exploring party, consisting of James O. Kerr, Sigmund Linsauer, Ralph A. Lund, Leo Williams, Jack Reynolds and Willard E. Holt, drove to the spot where the discovery was made, and made some further investigation and a few hours digging unearthed gunpowder, saddle blankets, Spanish bridle bits, parts of guns, a hatchet and various other pieces of merchandise, including fine handmade crochet work and laces, the whole concealed in a series of large bales of cloth, much of which was in a fair state of preservation and some of it just as good as it was the day it was hidden.

The unearthing of this supply of merchandise recalls to Sigmund Linsauer, one of the veteran merchants of Deming, who is known all over the southwest, the fact that 35 years ago there occurred in the Magdalena canyon, about eight miles from the scene of this discovery, a massacre by Apache Indians under the leadership of Chief Victoria. According to Mr. Linsauer's memory of the tragedy, a wagon train from Kansas was on the road from the Rio Grande valley to Silver City with a consignment of goods. It was attacked by Victoria and all were massacred.

After the massacre, which, according to all indications was a total destruction of the entire wagon train, the goods were taken to the nearest spot and buried under the overhang, the rock being placed behind the live bay and the second covering with brush, weeds and leaves a foot or two earth. Evidently the Indians left the end of one bolt of cloth sticking out to mark the place which their plunder was buried.

The history of the Indian raids tells of the subsequent killing of this band of Apaches, although their leader was not captured. It could be learned that birds do not like strong colors, or to ornamental things; that they are attracted by quiet tints; that certain birds prefer an entrance placed high, others low, etc.; that they are varied in their tastes and habits and particular about having the home that exactly suits them.

Unfortunate in His Friends.

"There are, said the gloomy man, who had just had a day with a W. C. T. U. convention, "only two kinds of people there are, those who some times get into trouble, and those who sometimes get out of it. Don't seem to know any of the latter."

MISTER FOX AND THE BONE

Unfortunately things sometimes happen to the smart, intelligent and brave who proved to Jack Rabbit when he again went to the hillside to see the Ten Fairies and their wonderful gifts. Jack had been sauntering leisurely along on his way from his burrow, not giving the least thought to the idea that anything might have happened to his friend, when, as he came in sight of the hillside, he saw Mister Fox sitting out in the sun, with his throat very much wrapped up and a general look of dejection in his attitude.

As soon as he saw this Jack Rabbit started on the run and arrived rather out of breath. "What is the matter and why have you your throat wrapped up so with a warm, woolen muffler?"

Mister Fox swallowed painfully before he answered. "The trouble with me is that I have too many bones."

"Too many bones?" said Jack Rabbit. "How is that, and what do you mean?"

"I mean," said Mister Fox, "that last night I added a bone to my system, which does not to have and there is not room for it. I expect to be very uncomfortable."

"How did it happen?" asked Jack Rabbit, "and can I help you in any way?"

"It happened in this way," said Mister Fox. "If you know I told you that I had dug a very fine hole under the fence around Farmer Wilkins's chicken yard, and that I expected that my kindness would result in some of the chickens escaping the next morning. Well, my suspicions were, as usual, very correct, and the next morning, fine large pullet, with my aid, came out through the hole I had dug and, strangely enough, I came along with her and escorted her directly to my house.

"She was very fine and plump, and after I had kept her for a few days I decided to have her for dinner. She proved so juicy and tender that I rather hurried as I ate her, and, not paying very special attention to the bones, I swallowed one which lodged in my throat. I swallowed and it would not go down, and I coughed and it would not come up, and there it is doing me not a particle of good, although I have no doubt it was all there very useful to the chicken."

"Well, what are you going to do?" asked Jack Rabbit.

"Why," said Mister Fox, "I am pretty proof of the wisdom that when you serve the wicked it should be a pest to reward, but should be thankful if you escape injury for your pains."

"That is certainly a wise conclusion," said Jack Rabbit, delighted with the story. "But, of course, you would not expect to profit by it in that way."

"No," said Mister Fox; "you see, I am not very well."

"Perhaps," said Jack Rabbit, "if I could get a pair of tongs from Farmer Wilson's fireplace I could use them in the same way that the crane used her bill."

"Perhaps you could," said Mister Fox. "Anyway, it would do no harm to try." And away ran Jack Rabbit to see if he could get the tongs.

SEVERAL KINDS OF FAIRIES

Cardboard Boxes of Different Sizes Can Be Turned Into Toys—Dogs, Cats and Wild Animals.

Do you believe in fairies? Of course there are many kinds of fairies, just like there are many kinds of children, good fairies, bad fairies, good fairies, water fairies and bogey fairies. But there are ten fairies that you carry about with you. What? Ten fairies in your fingers. Now these fairies need a very bright light to work by, and always near at hand are the Ten Fairies, and the light of your eyes. Here are some things that the Ten Fairies can make for you, some cardboard boxes of different sizes: Boxes can be turned into toys—houses, dogs, cats or wild animals. Now find some thin cardboard, a box of colored crayons, and a pair of sharp scissors. With your pencil draw a circle on the back of the cardboard box rim, cut the box rim curved like the rockers of a chair; the two ends of the box can be curved off evenly from corner to corner.

board. Fairy lamps and fingers will help you. The illustrations show how a rooster and a duck can be made with their feet drawn on the sides of the box. Have the bird's head large enough to fit the box body. Color the head, make the bill yellow and red, and the duck's bill feathers of the cock are reddish brown; there are many other colors you might choose for the duck. When you are making a box with a tail, make the tail on the cardboard, color it and cut it out. Heads and tails should be made separate and fitted into the top of the box, near the end, cut a slit in the end of the tail, and fit the slit—if he is a "tailed" bird, make a slit at the other end of the box, too, for the tail. Isn't this magic work? Half a cardboard box turned into a bird!

Make the box the same color as the feathers and the bird's neck. Come the legs and feet separately. Then put the toy on the floor and see how nicely it will fit.

Dogs, cats, rabbits and many other four-footed friends can be made by fairy fingers. If you are not sure how to draw heads or tails the Fairy Lamps can peep into picture books.

Suppose these animals get tired of rocking, and want to take a walk, make a small hole in the end of the box and pass a string through it. Now you can tie the toy about.

Making box toys is a splendid amusement for rainy days.

SEASIDE GAME OF SANDPIPER

Any Player Who Stops Hopping and Begins to Run Is Liable to Capture.

It's lots of fun to play "sandpiper" on the beach—or on the city pavement, for that matter. But, of course, you have to be a little acquainted and are playing in sand it seems more fun.

To play it, all the children except two form a flock of sandpipers. They hop up and down and up and down on the sand, while the two who are hunters try to catch them.

The hunters set forth their very best efforts to catch two of the sandpipers, so that they may become hunters in their turn. But it's not the easiest thing in the world to catch a bird, even with all of the cardboard box rim, cut the box rim curved like the rockers of a chair; the two ends of the box can be curved off evenly from corner to corner.

"This is Stephen, my little brother, and my little son," Beaches explained. "We have two children, the oldest is nine and the youngest is two. Have you had a baby day?"

"Huge!" I repeated. "Well, rather. I've been giving imitations of a bull-fight. Everybody I met was tired of it and I was the fight. Nominate your next! What'll it be, Beaches?"

"Sponge cake," said Stephen promptly.

"What else?" asked Peaches.

"More sponge cake," the youth replied. "I'm a little sick today and the antiseptic water stopped down to pick up a fork which Stephen had dropped.

In his anxiety not to miss anything Stevie rubbed unceremoniously, with the result that he upset a glass of ice water down the waiter's neck, and then, a second later the traitrotter had to send an extra and was saying things in French that would sound scandalous if translated.

It cost me a dollar to bring the dish dragger back to earth, and Stevie said I could break as many dishes when we got home and will do so. I'll make the money if I'd let him do it again.

Just then I got a flash of Pike Lawrence bearing down in our direction under the fire of Stevie's glance.

Pike was scuttling a three days' jag, and whispering words of encouragement to it.

A good fellow, Dike, but he shouldn't put a distillery to use his thirst as a testing station—he's too temperamental.

"Hurrye, Mrs. John!" he gurgled as the waiter pushed an extra chair under. "Hoosiers gone home to bed, I mean." Scuse me for interrupting a perfect gathering, but I thought you was alone!—I'm all in—that's it—I'm all in, and it's your fault, John; all your fault!"

"Why, what's wrong, Dike?" I inquired. "Everything" he maintained; "everything is wrong. I'm a wreck. Only one thing can save me—a drink! Hey, waiter! Hoody, John? How do do little boy? Scuse me for intruding on your fiz! Anything fresh? Well, too, I'm the tall. Isn't this magic work? Half a cardboard box turned into a bird!

Make the box the same color as the feathers and the bird's neck. Come the legs and feet separately. Then put the toy on the floor and see how nicely it will fit.

Dogs, cats, rabbits and many other four-footed friends can be made by fairy fingers. If you are not sure how to draw heads or tails the Fairy Lamps can peep into picture books.

Suppose these animals get tired of rocking, and want to take a walk, make a small hole in the end of the box and pass a string through it. Now you can tie the toy about.

Making box toys is a splendid amusement for rainy days.

THE CHARLEVOIX SENTINEL, CHARLEVOIX, MICH.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

By George V. Hobart

John Henry on the Lovelorn

SAY! have you ever noticed that when a gink with an aluminum loudpiece is handed the "Tim-Way-Out" signal by his adored one, he either hikes for a public parlor and begins to festoon his system with hops, or he stands in front of a hardware store and gases gloomily at the guns? You haven't noticed it? Why, you astonish me!

Friend wife met me by appointment to take dinner at the Saint Astormore the other evening, and with her was Lizz Hilly brother, Stephen, said sine.

"I brought Stevie with me because I had some shopping to do, and he's so much company." Peaches explained as we sat down in the restaurant.

"Stevie is always important company," I agreed, politely, but with a watchful eye on my youthful brother-in-law all the while.

That kid was born with an abnormal bump of mischief, and by painstaking endeavor he has won the world's championship for organizer of impromptu riots.

"Oh, John!" said Peaches, when I began to make faces at the menu card, "I didn't notice until you how pale you look. Have you had a baby day?"

"Huge!" I repeated. "Well, rather. I've been giving imitations of a bull-fight. Everybody I met was tired of it and I was the fight. Nominate your next! What'll it be, Beaches?"

"Sponge cake," said Stephen promptly.

"What else?" asked Peaches.

"More sponge cake," the youth replied. "I'm a little sick today and the antiseptic water stopped down to pick up a fork which Stephen had dropped.

In his anxiety not to miss anything Stevie rubbed unceremoniously, with the result that he upset a glass of ice water down the waiter's neck, and then, a second later the traitrotter had to send an extra and was saying things in French that would sound scandalous if translated.

It cost me a dollar to bring the dish dragger back to earth, and Stevie said I could break as many dishes when we got home and will do so. I'll make the money if I'd let him do it again.

Just then I got a flash of Pike Lawrence bearing down in our direction under the fire of Stevie's glance.

Pike was scuttling a three days' jag, and whispering words of encouragement to it.

A good fellow, Dike, but he shouldn't put a distillery to use his thirst as a testing station—he's too temperamental.

"Hurrye, Mrs. John!" he gurgled as the waiter pushed an extra chair under. "Hoosiers gone home to bed, I mean." Scuse me for interrupting a perfect gathering, but I thought you was alone!—I'm all in—that's it—I'm all in, and it's your fault, John; all your fault!"

"Why, what's wrong, Dike?" I inquired. "Everything" he maintained; "everything is wrong. I'm a wreck. Only one thing can save me—a drink! Hey, waiter! Hoody, John? How do do little boy? "I'm Stabbed!" Groaned the Startled Jag-Carpenter.

be mine and I will be thine without money and without the price?"

Nowadays pauses to let this idea get soiled about a little.

"Yes, I guess so: "Be mine, Imogene! You will be mine the money and without the price?"

Gonsalvo trembles with the passion which is consuming his pocketbook. Vitals with exquisite pangs languidly from a right angle triangle into more of a straight front and hands Gonsalvo a bitter look of scorn.

"Ha!" he exclaims, pushes his revolver, and aiming it at her marble brow, exclaims, "Marry me this minute or I will shoot you in the topknot. Because I love you."

Then pops rushes into the room and Gonsalvo politely requests the old geezer to hold his hat and fetch bullets for him for a few moments.

Gonsalvo then hikes deeple into a bottle of cordial sold and sets as the mourner climbs into the house the pistols of the modern duel and begins to work by, and always near at hand are the Ten Fairies, and the light of your eyes. Here are some things that the Ten Fairies can make for you, some cardboard boxes of different sizes: Boxes can be turned into toys—houses, dogs, cats or wild animals. Now find some thin cardboard, a box of colored crayons, and a pair of sharp scissors. With your pencil draw a circle on the back of the cardboard box rim, cut the box rim curved like the rockers of a chair; the two ends of the box can be curved off evenly from corner to corner.

If you wish to make a bird, just draw a bird's head on the thin cardboard. Fairy lamps and fingers will help you. The illustrations show how a rooster and a duck can be made with their feet drawn on the sides of the box. Have the bird's head large enough to fit the box body. Color the head, make the bill yellow and red, and the duck's bill feathers of the cock are reddish brown; there are many other colors you might choose for the duck. When you are making a box with a tail, make the tail on the cardboard, color it and cut it out. Heads and tails should be made separate and fitted into the top of the box, near the end, cut a slit in the end of the tail, and fit the slit—if he is a "tailed" bird, make a slit at the other end of the box, too, for the tail. Isn't this magic work? Half a cardboard box turned into a bird!

Make the box the same color as the feathers and the bird's neck. Come the legs and feet separately. Then put the toy on the floor and see how nicely it will fit.

Dogs, cats, rabbits and many other four-footed friends can be made by fairy fingers. If you are not sure how to draw heads or tails the Fairy Lamps can peep into picture books.

The KITCHEN CABINET

To be a worthy queen I must
Remember a host of things in now,
It calls for clever choice and tact
And much that many things have lacked.
To be a queen one must command
Her housemaids, gifts in hand
Cooks with the artist's pride in art
And leaveed with a master hand. —Wright.

TOOTHSOME COCOANUT DISHES.

When the fresh nut may be obtained there are so many delightful dishes which one may prepare for the family that the economical nut ought to be a common combination often served.

Curried Cocoanut or Rabbit—Joint a well dressed chicken or rabbit and fry a light brown in butter; remove from the pan and fry a sliced onion, then add three tablespoonfuls of grated cocoanut (the dry may be used if soaked in milk for an hour), a teaspoonful of curry powder, one teaspoonful of chutney, a half cupful of milk or stock, a teaspoonful of salt, then add the chicken and simmer 40 minutes. Add a tablespoonful of lemon juice and serve with plain boiled rice.

There are any number of comfort dishes that are delicious made with cocoanut, as well as cake fillings and puddings. A custard pie sprinkled with a generous handful of cocoanut is well liked.

Cocoanut added to a salmon salad is perhaps a little unusual, but is really very delicious.

Banana Salad.—Take two cupfuls of grated cocoanut, a pint of chopped apple, a tablespoonful of chopped green pepper, one of green and a teaspoonful of grated onion, seasoned well with salt and a dash of cayenne, if the red pepper is used. Is a very good salad.

Cocoanut Cookies.—Take a cupful of cocoanut, a cupful of currants, two cupfuls of brown sugar, a half cupful of butter, one-half cupful of lard, one cupful of raisins, a teaspoonful of baking soda, a half teaspoonful of cinnamon, a quarter teaspoonful of cloves, a half pound of dates, seeded and cut in pieces, a half teaspoonful of nutmeg. Beat all together and bake in a moderate oven 45 minutes. The ingredients are added together before mixing, making it a quick cake to prepare.

Orange Filling—Mix a cupful and a half of sugar, with six tablespoonfuls of flour, then add the grated rind and juice of an orange, a tablespoonful of lemon juice, one egg slightly beaten and a tablespoonful of butter. Cook until smooth and thick, stirring constantly. Cool and spread on the cake. Cover with a white icing.

"For years I had a coffee drinker until at last I became a terrible sufferer from dyspepsia, constipation, headaches and indigestion.

"The different kinds of medicine I tried did not cure me, and finally my doctor told me to leave off coffee and take up Postum. I was tender to having the Postum made strictly according to directions on the pkg., so that from the very first I found it fine.

"Gradually my condition changed. The old troubles disappeared and I began to feel well again. My appetite became good and my nerves quiet down. Now I am restored to strength and health, can sleep sound all night and work all day without any trouble.

"I am really a monument built by Postum, for I was a physical wreck, distressed in body and mind, and am now a strong, healthy man. I know exactly what I owe to the change. It was leaving off coffee and using Postum."

ANCIENT ORDER OF CLEANERS

Gleaners of Charlevoix County Hold Rally at Boyne City

Preparations are being made for the largest gathering of farmers ever held in this part of Michigan, when the Gleaners of Charlevoix county hold their rally at Boyne City on Wednesday, September 22nd. There will be three sessions—a federation session in the morning; a public session in the afternoon, and a closed session in the evening. Besides an address to be made by Grant Slocum, founder of the Gleaner Order, there will be recitals by Miss Lucia Bellamy of Ionia, recitations and singing by local talent, explanations of the new degrees of the Order, speech-making, military drills, feasting and an all-round good time.

A silver cup will be awarded the best dramatic work by a local Arbor degree team. The ladies' team putting on the best Ruth degree work will receive large pennants. The work will be something every Gleaner should see. The several teams will receive expert instructions in the degrees and fancy drills.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Marvin of Detroit, Federation Supervisor and Assistant, have completed early plans and arrangements in the county by assigning each of the twelve Arbors active parts. These Arbors are busy at this time.

The twelve Arbors have started contests for the promotion of the lecture service and securing new members are as follows, namely:

FLAG DAY, SATURDAY AUG. 7TH

A Flag Day will be held in Charlevoix on Saturday, August 7th, for the benefit of the Michigan Child Welfare League to aid them in their work of caring for poor crippled or handicapped children all over the State of Michigan. The Michigan Child Welfare League is incorporated, non-sectarian and is highly endorsed by the State Board of Correction and Charities. The work of the League is supported entirely by voluntary gifts of the people, membership fees and proceeds from tag-day or flag-day.

The citizens of Charlevoix are asked to co-operate with the local committee in this beautiful charity of giving a crippled boy or girl a chance to be better able physically to be self-supporting.

Many children in Charlevoix county have received benefit from the League. The Flag Day committee will be assisted in the sale of tags by many promnent young ladies who will call upon you at your homes and meet you upon the streets. Meet them as generously as you can with your gifts for this work.

Every thoughtful citizen realizes that the Nation's future finds its judgment in the children of today.

The Charlevoix County Bank will be headquarters for Flag Day, and Mr. A. F. Bridge is chairman of the finance committee.

Buy a flag Saturday, August 7th.

LOST—A indian black bag containing a gold watch, a silver watch and a sum of money. A liberal reward will be paid for its return with contents, to the Chicago Club.

TWO WAYS OF LOOKING AT THINGS

Another revolution has broken out in the little so-called republic of Haiti. The president was taken out and shot, and the miserable little island is in a state of anarchy.

Immediately the United States government landed marines and then landed more, while still more are on their way. One American marine was killed, and a few Haitian niggers. The Michigan National Guard brigade would like no better fun than to clean up the whole black outfit in forty-eight hours.

Over in Mexico a state of anarchy has existed for two years. American property has been confiscated or destroyed, probably a hundred Americans killed, the American flag insulted, and the American government has been satisfied with wordful wariness. Outrages are still being committed and Washington still continues to "warn."

There are two ways of looking at things.

The subjugation of Haiti is merely a picnic party. Mexico is bigger.

JUST CASUAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is not strange that Chicago should be excited over the Eastland disaster; but in the State and municipal investigation they have lost their heads. When Inspectors Reid and Ekhiff were brought before the grand jury Monday they were handcuffed to each other. This was not only unnecessary but brutal. They could not escape if they would, and they would not if they could. "Give unto us Barabas," Somebody must be crucified, innocent or guilty.

Col. Roosevelt announces that he will never return to the republican party. He and that will be easier as a progressive in 1916. Nobody cares a rap how he registers. He is as thoroughly eliminated from all political consideration as W. J. Bryan is, and that is saying a good deal.

The little birds are twittering that Chase Osborn will be a candidate for governor in 1916. I'll be a lot odd for a campaign that will be a hummer.

CIRCUS COMING.

There is no tented aggregation whose performance is complete without clowns. There are clowns, but who's there that's better without them unless they are clowns that are funny without being foolish. Only a fool will laugh at his folly, is a maxim that stands good in relation to clowns, just the same as it does to those who are not clowns. Clowns are only engaged to make others laugh, and the successful clown is he who can create laughter without laughing himself. The Howe Great London Show is coming here on Thursday, Aug. 12, and will bring with them no less than forty of these funny fellows; and they are all funny. To create mirth has been a life-long study with them, and that they have become most perfect is evident by the endorsements they have received wherever they have been seen. They are admitted to be the best class of pure fun makers in this country. There are pantomime clowns, acrobatic clowns, juggling clowns and clowns that perform acts of magic in their own inimitable style. Then there are the comic supplement bunch, from old Happy Hooligan to Jeff and Mutt, and Jay look and act their parts.

There is hardly an act introduced but what is aided by the comedy of these funny fellows. They are everywhere when at least expected, and anywhere where they can create laughter. They have the scene at times all to themselves, and then it is that there is nothing but laughter. They are a feature with this show, and one of the features that you can ill afford to miss.

TEACHERS' EXAMINATION.

The regular teachers' examination will be held August 12th to 14 in Charlevoix. Applicants wishing papers for regular teachers' certificates please write with me. Written reports of the reading circle books will be accepted in place of theory and art test, leading is based on Dickson's "American Scholar." Certificates of all grades issued. Paper furnished.

One of the best samples of street improvement yet attempted in this city is being done on Rose street by Street Commissioner Lusk. This street is really a continuation of Park avenue starting the park, and Mr. Lusk's good work cannot fail to make it a popular drive.

Mayor Wilmer on Tuesday received from aviator Bud Morris, now at Chicago, the following message: "Has your city accommodations for a passenger carrying flying boat? I am starting my Chicago to New York flight and would like to stay for a few weeks in Charlevoix. Would need landing place and facilities for reception of passengers. Will you co-operate?" The Mayor wired him to come on.

At eight o'clock an immense crowd gathered in the large casino. Soon the entertainment committee consisting of Mrs. Joe Knight, Mr. Rudolph Eck and Mrs. Reynolds announced that the pigeon walk would be introduced by Miss Minnie Cole and Mr. Wm. Eckhis immediately after Mr. Jack Evans and Mrs. Rebekah Drew gave a fine illustration of the Virginia reel. Music was furnished by the Wildwood orchestra. At a late hour the crowd was served to a grand five-course dinner, in the large dining room at "Gaddon Inn." Toasts were given by the Hon. John Gallagher, Mrs. Brown, Mr. Reynolds and Mr. and Mrs. Garret Cole. For a nice time Miss Cole suggests Beaver Island.

The promoters of the Masonic Fair embrace many of the best citizens of Charlevoix, as well as many of the best ladies of Charlevoix. Further comment is unnecessary.

Capt. Sam Rose, manager of the Masonic Fair, should launch out as a publicity man for a big circus. His masterly work in this enterprise is a matter of general public comment.

The lot sale of the twelve acre Ward Addition by the Louisville Real Estate and Development Co. last week was a pronounced success, every lot being sold at prices ranging from $16 to $125. As the lots are but 25 feet front they were sold in groups of two or more. The five lot went to John Sharrow, son of Louis Sharrow.

The Indians have just closed the most successful camp meeting they have ever held. The preaching of the Rev. Moses Smith and the side work by Rev. Isaac Greenwood were the special features. The Indians are grateful to the Bay Shore orchestra, and to the merchants who assisted them. The community have reason to be proud of the godly Indians of Greensky Hill church.

A visitor to Charlevoix Indian camp meeting last week was Mrs. Robert Agosa, of Omena, advertising the 22d annual Indian camp meeting to open at Northport Friday of this week and continue ten days. Mrs. Agosa is a splendid type of the refined and educated Indian woman. She is a graduate of Carlisle, and, if we mistake not, finished her education at Albion college. Her husband is also a well educated Indian of most excellent character and standing. Together they exert a most wholesome influence among their people. The gathering at Northport is a State affair, and is under Methodist auspices.

DEATH OF HENRY DIXON.

Henry Dixon, a pioneer farmer of Marion, was found dead in his harvest field Monday afternoon. He arose Monday morning in his usual health, and in the forenoon walked over to the Nicholls farm on business, returning home for dinner, still apparently in good health. After dinner he went to the oats field with his cradle. Late in the afternoon a member of his family found him lying in the field dead, without doubt from some form of heart trouble.

Deceased came here from Canada thirty-five years ago, locating in Marion. He was a man well known for his business and personal rectitude, and a good citizen. Besides a wife, he leaves twelve living children as follows: Henry, William, Gunnor, Thomas and Charles, Mrs. Eleanor Williams, Mrs. Mary Balch, Mrs. Ethel Harrison, Mrs. Eva Welch, Mrs. Lettie Williams, Mrs. Mabel Larsaly, Mrs. Lillian Olsen.

FLAG DAY ON SATURDAY.

The Flag Day conducted last Saturday for the benefit of the Michigan Child Welfare League to aid in their work of caring for crippled or handicapped children netted the League $121.55.

The Finance Committee, A. F. Bridge, W. J. Rachow, W. E. Hampton, Capt. O. E. Wilber, received the funds collected, and through them they were directed to the League.

The local committee who had charge of the Flag Day were Mrs. W. E. Hampton, chairman; Mrs. A. F. Bridge, Mrs. Lute Shanahan, Mrs. H. A. Nicholls, Mrs. S. A. Bush, Mrs. A. Coulter, Mrs. J. L. Crane, Mrs. H. A. Harsha and Mrs. Allen Wilkinson. These ladies were assisted by many young people who offered the flags for sale. Mrs. Cora Lamping, general director of the League, and Mrs. Mildred B. Kennedy, a representative of the League, who was here and arranged for the Flag day, and the Michigan Child Welfare League wish to express their thanks and appreciation to every one who helped to make the day a success.

The Michigan Child Welfare League is incorporated, non-sectarian and approved by the State Board of Charities and Correction. The work of the League is supported entirely by voluntary gifts of the people, membership fees and proceeds from Tag day or Flag day sales.

The League wish to express their appreciation to the citizens and visitors in Charlevoix for their generous support of this work.

Some cases of children reported to the League have been carefully investigated and will come up as circumstances will permit.

The citizens of Charlevoix are asked to report all cases of crippled or handicapped children to the League, 815 Chamber of Commerce, Detroit, Mich.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN

If press opinions count for anything Kibbe and Martin's production of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which will be seen at the Charlevoix Theatre, Thursday, August 12th, (to-day) has caught the public fancy. For a play holding the stage over fifty years within which period not a single season has elapsed during which it was entirely absent from the theatre, "Uncle Tom's Cabin" still exhibits wonderful vitality.

See the big street parade at noon.

TO CORRECT PLAT RECORDS.

E. C. Curtz and Sam C. Taylor, from the Register's office, have been busily working at the court house some days the past week, on the work of revising the plats of Charlevoix county, in compliance with the recently enacted law providing for uniformity in county and state records involving recorded plats. It having been developed that in nearly every county there are very glaring discrepancies.

THE MANITOU'S ADVENTURE

The Popular Liner Was Not in Slightest Danger—Backed off With Her Own Power.

A Chicago paper prints the following concerning the Manitou's recent encounter with the bathing beach:

The steamship Manitou, one of the fastest of great lakes liners, stuck her nose into the sandbank opposite the Clarendon beach off Windsor avenue today while maneuvering at "dead reckoning" in a dense fog. Before the boat was able to extricate herself the 175 passengers aboard, including James H. Forgan, Mrs. Forgan, Leicester Spaulding and twenty other guests of the Harker-Spaulding wedding at Harbor Point Saturday, were given plenty of thrills and excitement.

Wireless calls brought tugs, other liners and water craft of all kinds to the rescue. But the Manitou did not need assistance and backed out, unaided, steaming into port only fifty minutes late.

There was no danger. The lake was calm, there being scarcely a ripple except what was caused by the churning of the boat's propellers in the battle of steam against sand.

First information of the occurrance was given by officials of the Northern Michigan Transportation Company, owners of the boat. The Manitou is one of the company's four boats, the other three being the Minnesota, Missouri and Illinois. All run between Mackinac Island and Chicago.

It was shortly after 6 o'clock when residents along the lake shore heard the whistle of the boat close inland and realized it was in trouble. Shortly afterward the steamship company was notified by winders that the boat was in the sand, but in no danger. The liner, Illinois, two tugs and Captain Charles Garland of the Life Guards, with his crew, were sent to the scene.

When the rescue boats reached the scene the Manitou, blowing her siren at the high in triumph, was backing by her own steam into deep water.

Mr. Forgan was among the first to descend the gangplank.

"We were a little frightened when the boat struck the shore," he said. "Hardly any of us felt the shock and did not know of the boat's predicament until notified by an officer.

"I went to the deck at once and saw that we were pretty well in the sand. There was no danger, however, and the passengers took it more or less as a joke."

Mrs. Donald McFerran, who was matron of honor at the Harker-Spaulding wedding and is herself a bride of only a few weeks, at whose wedding the former Miss Barker was one of the bridal party, laughed when questioned about the grounding of the Manitou.

"Oh, we were not in the least afraid. It seemed rather like an interesting adventure when we heard the boat was in the sand," she said.

YEAR AROUND SERVICE FOR LAKE PORTS

Ludington, Frankfort and Manistee will be the first three ports on this shore of Lake Michigan to get year round coast guard service, said Congressman James C. McLaughlin, who first brought the matter to the attention of government authorities. The fact that these ports were made open to navigation all winter resulted in their being chosen for increased service.

REPUBLICAN BANQUET

Boyne City Local Committee Does Good Work and Reports Progress.

The Charlevoix County Republican Club held a meeting at Boyne City last Wednesday night, at which the several committees were appointed and a good start given the arrangements for the banquet to come off at Boyne City August 27th.

J. M. Harris, as a special committee of one appointed on a previous occasion to secure speakers, reported the acceptance of the following: Senator Townsend, former Congressman Dickema, Congressman Frank D. Scott, and correspondence has been opened with good prospect of securing Hon. Joseph Cannon, of Illinois.

An effort is also being made to secure Eddie Guest, the renowned newspaper humorist, of Detroit.

There is every prospect that this event will eclipse in interest and attendance any previous gathering of its kind in this county. Republicans propose to demonstrate the fact that they are very much alive.

THE MASONIC FAIR.

Monday morning the doors of the Masonic Fair were opened to the public and the week of the Masonic Fair was ushered in. Thus far, Wednesday morning, the event has scored well. The attendance the afternoon and evening of the first day was very encouraging, and continues to increase.

In every room are booths, all presided over by ladies of the Eastern Star. About everything that can be found in a mail order house catalogue is to be found on the floor. Candy, various delections to assuage that ingrowing thirst, and a lunch if you are hungry.

Prizes are given by lot every day, and the manager is hunting for the lucky number that drew a fine fountain pen Monday. There is a plow up in the "north-east corner" of the main lodge room, which is said to have been used in excavating for the foundation of Solomon's Temple.

Someone will get that fine Ford automobile, on exhibition on the street. As a matter of fact, the Masonic Fair is thus far a big success, but there is some disappointment in the hauling off of the prize of a trip on board the Grand Traverse Bay route, as she was to have brought in an excursion of Traverse City Masons.

But be sure and visit the fair.

W. C. T. U.

STARVE OUT THE HESSIAN FLY!

PREPARED BY THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

ORGANIZE TO FIGHT THE FLY

The county demonstration agents in northern Michigan, together with a number of entomologists and other agricultural experts recently held a meeting to discuss ways and means, and formulated a campaign to starve out the Hessian fly, as the most effective method of starting the work or organizing the farmers to eliminate the fly, according to the department's specialists, said by all means should be followed throughout the Eighteen territory. Three Oklahoma agents and farmers have already adopted a specific campaign which, it is claimed, is the one recommended by the United States department of agriculture, as follows:

STARVE OUT THE HESSIAN FLY.

The Hessian fly, being in the "flaxseed" stage in wheat stubble and in unharvested wheat from June till September, or even October in the fields, can be destroyed by carrying out the following methods of control:

1. Burn, where possible and safe, all stubble and ruined wheat.
2. Plow under deeply all stubble and ruined wheatfields before August 15; harrow thoroughly and roll if necessary.
3. Harrow, disk, pasture, or otherwise effectually destroy all volunteer wheat.
5. As a measure preparatory to sowing, plow as early and early as existing conditions will permit; disk, harrow, and roll until a thoroughly pulverized, compact seed bed is obtained.
6. Do not sow wheat until after fly-free date.
7. Rotate your crops if possible.

THE loss in this year's wheat crop from the ravages of the Hessian fly will amount to millions of bushels in an area extending from southeastern Oklahoma and northern Arkansas, northeast through northern and southeastern Michigan, and eastward including principally the states of Pennsylvania. It is now so late that nothing can be done to save the crop in the devastations of the Hessian fly to this year's crop, but it is nearly time to commence the fight against the fly to reduce the toll which it will assuredly take in 1916, if the fly is allowed to hatch by millions on early sown wheat or volunteer wheat this fall. Millions of acres will again be sown to the Hessian fly during the year 1916. These warnings, based on observations made from Maine and Pennsylvania throughout the entire area of the threatened outbreak, were not for the purpose of creating undue alarm, but were fully justified in view of the great abundance of the Hessian fly at that time and the unusual extent to which it has become subject to parasite or natural enemy that is most influential in holding the pest in check. It is to be hoped that farmers generally will profit by last year's experience, and in no case plant wheat during August, but wait until the date indicated on the accompanying map as to the proper time for planting in their locality.

Nowhere, either in the East or West, should wheat be sown on short stubble if this course can, possibly be avoided. It is true that in some sections of Iowa and Missouri, good crops have been obtained from such stubble, and, therefore, any kind of cultivation of these stubble fields is rendered impractical, though in most cases it would be far better to sacrifice an except the very best seedling. Wherever the Hessian fly has been found will not destroying the young seedling, and where the infestation is light, it is the only practical method that the farmer can use is that of delaying the sowing until the flies have made their way from the stubble to the fields and died there without being able to find any plants upon which to deposit their eggs.

It should be borne in mind that the most practical and effective method of controlling the Hessian fly are identical with the best methods of producing the maximum yields of wheat. It is entirely possible for the farmer to fight the Hessian fly by the process of good farming, including cultivation, good seed, and a rotation of crops. The most serious objection to most practical and effective method that can be employed to control this pest is the fold—namely, the possibility that there is danger of so delaying the growth of the plants that they do not become sufficiently advanced to enable them to withstand the winter.

Much of the delay in the growth of late-sown plants is the rain can be eliminated by taking close attention to the preparation of the soil and to the quality of the seed; but if the soil lacks plant food, or if a abundance occurs in the attack, that vicorous plants overcome, is fatal, because of the lowering of nutritive condition of the plant itself. The best advice that can be given is to begin the preparation of the field in the fall precisely as though it was expected to sow at a very early date, but instead of sowing use the disk harrow and the roller, even after it appears to be a waste of labor to fill the field further.

When a firm, well-pulverized, compact seed bed has been secured, the seed should be selected.

PLANT WHEAT AFTER DATES SHOWN ON THE TOP

Map showing approximate dates in the fall, in various parts of the country, when it is safe to sow wheat, with meteorological conditions which may exert without exposing it to serious attacks of the Hessian fly. The dotted lines show approximately the limits of the Hessian fly infestation in the region of the United States. The figures on the map show the approximate date of the adults in the fall, the dates after which, if wheat is sown, it will escape the attacks of the insect. This region of the Great Lakes and Middle West, and the Appalachian Mountain region.

OUR SPOILED HUSBANDS

How far the American wife can safely go without the help of her husband in the management of the farm is a question which grounds more or less upon the man's personality, but there are some points which are of almost universal application.

The husband who is a slacker, who works for "Ma" and the dear ones in that home, is entitled to quite a large amount of food wifely indulgence—in fact, to a certain point, he may be and should be "spoilt."

But beyond that certain point a very gentle, but very firm, line may be drawn, because the best men over born will become selfish and selfish if a woman's indulgence is carried to the limit of his slave.

And there are some wives who almost unconsciously put themselves in this unsuitable and impractical position, which frequently ruins and pamper until the master of the house becomes as occasional as an eastern potentate.

Take the case of a woman who married only recently and who may be referred to as Mr. and Mrs. Noble.

Every morning now, before Mr. North gets up, his wife opening out socks and undergarments in exactly the most convenient and adjustable position; she takes the razor out of the case; she fills the bath and she lets out a bedroom slipper mostly lifes.

Then she waits in anxious humility until Harry comes the bathroom door and shouts "Ready!"—which means that she may now brush and part and bristilize his hair, fasten his collar, put in his tunics, lace his boots, pull up his socks, turn up his trousers, filer his fat, bolter his toast, pour out his coffee, fill his tobacco pouch, find his ticket, brush his hat, roll up his umbrella, collect his money, polish his eyeglasses, unfold his handkerchief, look for his watch and finally open the gate and watch him down the road.

These or similar slavish attentions are repeated in the evening.

Of course, the wife who refrains from doing all in her power to make home truly a "home," which means that she may work and part and pay the rent and taxes is not worthy of her husband. No affectionate consideration, should be spared, no wish overlooked, no request forgiven, no loving attention neglected, to her happiness to do all she can for him who does so much for her—her supreme pleasure to make her husband happy.

But there are times and cases when a line must be drawn, and the wise wife is the who looks out for danger signals which tend to show that she is drifting way just a little too much.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

FIRST AID TO THE WOUNDED

Soldiers in the Trenches Carry Medicine Chest Without Which They Temporary Relief From Suffering.

Trench warfare has opened new problems to medical science, especially in Belgium and France. With a dugout in the trench or work available, conditions are so different from those observed by other forms of warfare, but in the long miles of trenches stretching through Europe, it has been found absolutely impossible to have trained medical assistance anywhere near handy. Many men have to lie wounded for hours without attention, and many others are compelled to suffer with the different trench diseases without relief.

When a trench is hotly contested, or even under attack, it is impossible to remove the sick and wounded by day without the aide men being able to make their dissolute operations back to safety. Sometimes fighting is going on in a semisolid prematic fashion and inclosed in a collapsible tube of uniform size. The amount of this paste, or ointment, is so small that it can be carried by the farmer in leaves the devastations of the Hessian fly to this year's crop, but it is necessary to commence the fight against the fly to reduce the toll which it will assuredly take in 1916, if the fly is allowed to hatch by millions on early sown wheat or volunteer wheat this fall. Millions of acres will again be sown to the Hessian fly during the year 1916. These warnings, based on observations made from Maine and Pennsylvania throughout the entire area of the threatened outbreak, were not for the purpose of creating undue alarm, but were fully justified in view of the great abundance of the Hessian fly at that time and the unusual extent to which it has become subject to parasite or natural enemy that is most influential in holding the pest in check. It is to be hoped that farmers generally will profit by last year's experience, and in no case plant wheat during August, but wait until the date indicated on the accompanying map as to the proper time for planting in their locality.

Nowhere, either in the East or West, should wheat be sown on short stubble if this course can, possibly be avoided. It is true that in some sections of Iowa and Missouri, good crops have been obtained from such stubble, but in most cases it would be far better to sacrifice an except the very best seedling. Wherever the Hessian fly has been found will not destroying the young seedling, and where the infestation is light, it is the only practical method that the farmer can use is that of delaying the sowing until the flies have made their way from the stubble to the fields and died there without being able to find any plants upon which to deposit their eggs.

It should be borne in mind that the most practical and effective method of controlling the Hessian fly are identical with the best methods of producing the maximum yields of wheat. It is entirely possible for the farmer to fight the Hessian fly by the process of good farming, including cultivation, good seed, and a rotation of crops. The most serious objection to most practical and effective method that can be employed to control this pest is the fold—namely, the possibility that there is danger of so delaying the growth of the plants that they do not become sufficiently advanced to enable them to withstand the winter.

Much of the delay in the growth of late-sown plants is the rain can be eliminated by taking close attention to the preparation of the soil and to the quality of the seed; but if the soil lacks plant food, or if a abundance occurs in the attack, that vicorous plants overcome, is fatal, because of the lowering of nutritive condition of the plant itself. The best advice that can be given is to begin the preparation of the field in the fall precisely as though it was expected to sow at a very early date, but instead of sowing use the disk harrow and the roller, even after it appears to be a waste of labor to fill the field further.

When a firm, well-pulverized, compact seed bed has been secured, the seed should be selected.

THE FAIRIES' DISGUISE

Once upon a time there lived an old woman in a little house on the edge of the woods. She had a little garden back of the house and in front grew the prettiest flowers of all kinds. There were golden-glow, sunflowers, pansies, petunias, marigolds and all the gay-colored flowers you can think of, and she called them her children.

The old lady loved them dearly and gave them the best of care.

She had plenty to eat in the summer when the vegetables grew in the garden, but when the winter came it was very hard for the old lady to get enough to eat.

One night when the wind was blowing around her little house, she sat before the fire wondering what she would eat the next day, for all the food was gone. "If only had my flower children to look at," she said, "that would be some comfort, but they are asleep under the cold ground and will not show me their smiling faces until spring."

Suddenly the door opened and a little creature, or fairy, stepped in, and for she looked like a pansy walking about, entered the room. Then a fog, a marigold followed, and a golden-glow came in, and soon the fairies filled the room, and soon the place seemed like flower garden. The old lady thought all the flowers had come to visit the old lady from under the snow.

"Why, my children, how did you get here?" the old lady asked. "I did not intend it at all, for I had not a cent in the world to give you and we can do any work."

"We will get supper for you," said one flower, "but we know you were lonely and wanted us and we begged to be allowed to visit you just for one night." Each flower had a smiling face and the old lady quite forgot her hunger.

"We will get supper for you," said one flower, "you take care of us all the spring and summer and for one night we will work one hour."

The door opened and in walked a platter with a roast of beef upon it.

In Walked a Platter With a Roast of Beef Upon It.

A dish of potatoes trotted after it, dishes of food of all kinds came to the table and just as the clock in the hall was closing the door a loud call was heard and in rushed a pot of tea, steaming steam through its nose.

"Supper is ready," said, "I'm all out of breath. I ran so fast: I waited to steep and the other dishes got ahead of me! I know the food of the old lady would rather have me than any."

The old lady was feeling the table placing the dishes upon it, and the less ran out the door as soon as the tea pot came in the door. They did look so funny, all those legs moving around and not being "pot shaped."

"Now," said a tall sunflower, "you sit down and eat."

And all the flowers crowded around her chair and pushed it to the table. "I did not know you were so strong," said the lady.

"We are not good at home," but you know we were beautiful, you see more beauty in us than anyone and you love us and we love you and we can do any work for you."

When the old lady was eating her dinner some of the flowers ran into the closet and looked into the empty flour barrel and when they put on the cover it was full of good white flour. Then the sugar box was visited and when they left the pantry there was food to last for the winter. When the old lady finished her dinner the flowers cleared the table and then they began to dance.

They sang as they whirled around the room, and soon the old lady was asleep. Then the flowers stopped dancing. They went to the fire and put on a big log and then one of them whispered to the old lady.

"Look," she said, "it is one minute to twelve and we must be gone. Put your clothes up to twelve o'clock. We had better hurry."

They opened the door very softly, but when they reached the steps the clock began to strike and when the last stroke sounded there were in the place of the fairies a few faded flowers and the flowers had disappeared. The fairies had visited the dear old lady dressed as her flower children, because she loved them so dearly, and they thought if they disguised themselves as the flowers they could help the old lady more than they could by wooder who they were.

ADD GREATLY TO NEWSPAPER

Little Folks May Be Entertained by Jokes, Games and "Catches" on Any Festive Occasion.

On a festive occasion when little folks are gathered together, jokes and "catches" always add greatly to the merriment, and the more there is of "catches" and games we know, the better we can entertain them.

We give, herewith, illustrating some harmless jokes, games, and "catches," that will lead to a good deal of amusement and, if not new to all, will be new to a good many of the little folks.

For the first joke, you hold up one finger, as shown in Fig. 1, and waggle it backwards and forwards and say to your neighbor, "Have you lost your mind?" Of course, he will say, "No!" and you then say, "Because it is missed!"

Illustrated Jokes for the Little Folks.

Another little bit of fun is to ask your neighbor to place one hand upon himself or herself in such a position that he or she cannot touch anything. If some amusing contortions generally take place before this little difficulty is overcome, it is well to ask the question in illustrated by Fig. 2.

Another trick with a tumbler, and one that not always, but nearly always, succeeds, is to borrow a silver quarter from one of the company and insert a tumbler, and place it upon the top. You then ask the owner of the coin if it is on the top or the bottom of the glass, and he will hesitate before he replies. When he has given his answer, you say—

"Oh, I shall not go on with this trick. I see you know it," and at the same time you hand him back not the quarter, but a nickel substituted for it. In some cases, the fact that the nickel will be pocketed without the change having been noticed, and that is where the "laugh comes in," for you can say "You have lost your half dime quarter" and the owner will say, "Yes," then you can have an argument with the man about whether you had, or not.

With some half-sheets of notepaper and pencils some good fun may be had and one amusing game is to try to see who can succeed in each hand and try and draw a circle and a square at the same time. Very few will be successful in doing this, draw lines some have quite a creditable dexterity. Diagram 4 explains this. Sometimes I and I bring drawn at the same time, and 2 and 3 at the same time.

PLAY FOR HOT SUMMER DAYS

Modeling in a Special Dough Is Amusing and Instructive—Recipe Is Simple—May Be Made Permanent.

There are lots of days in summer when it's too hot to play rough, noisy games. Modeling in a special dough is just the thing for such days.

Mothers who have found that modeling in a special dough is packs of fun and cool as well.

The dough is made by taking a cupful of cornstarch, half a cupful of salt and two cupfuls of water. Cook the mixture in a double boiler, stirring it constantly until it becomes thick and smooth. Then place the dough upon a platter, cover with a cloth and let it stand until it is cool enough to handle. Then knead it thoroughly, and then pouring enough boiling water over them to make a stiff dough.

Turn this out on a board, over which has been sprinkled a little flour and sprinkled, and you will be able to fashion it into whatever objects you desire. The more it is worked the better dough it becomes.

This is a specially good model to make, it can be put in the oven and baked hard, so that it is a permanent souvenir.

All sorts of things, animals, flowers, heads, dishes, vases, figures, etc., can be fashioned with just a little experimenting.

To Play Pickled Portraits.

Each player is given a sheet of paper and a pencil. Each draws a portrait of the person next to him as funny as he can. He then folds it backward, leaving an inch or two of the head show where the neck is. The paper is then passed to the person on his right hand neighbor, who draws a body and arms, and passes it on, leaving in sight only the knees of the person who is to draw the legs. The third person who gets it draws the legs and feet, and the last one who gets it writes a name. It is then unfolded and passed around for everyone to laugh at.

An Egg Trick.

Hold a raw egg on end and spin it with a twist of your smooth surface. Quickly place the hand upon it for an instant, stopping the motion momentarily. When the hand is removed the egg will resume its spinning. This is a position of the egg that is the shell confined to which rapidly "drop your hand stopped the shell, and if it is quickly released the whirling contents will be a little distorted, but not enough to cause any comment.

SHOULD NOT HAVE MOVED

Story of a Man Who Was Making Good, but Roving Fever Got the Best of Him.

On May 4th, 1916, the Chi. Post Farmer's Dispatch contained a very interesting account of the ex. riences of a man from Stapleo, Miss. Realizing that he was not making much headway, he decided to look up a homestead in Canada. With $250 he and his wife took up a homestead near Outlook, Saskatchewan. After experiencing his experiences of a few years, in which they had undergone hardship which were likely to be unavoidable, with a small amount of capital, he continues the story by stating that in the fall after a fair summer's work on his 160 acres cropped, he cleaned up nearly all his debts, having now four good horses, a complete set of farm machinery including two wagons and a "Jewell" top buggy and eleven head of cattle. He continues: "However, I was not satisfied. I had been reading of the rapid land advances that were to be had in Montana. It was near cheap and I thought it would get cheaper, so I began to think that homesteading as a moneymaking proposition was better than farming.

I did not stop to consider that wheat was not the main crop, it was a matter of 2 bushels to the acre and 40 cents a pound. Eggs and butter had to go in groceries and more, we had now four milch cows, two heifers coming in and more calves to raise. We had a cream separator, and some hogs. We had a garden and a half acre of corn, and raise an abundance of small grain, roots and grass for feed, but I could not stand it and sold that "moving" fever, and decided to sell.

I sold my place for cash at $2,000 cash. I could not find anyone with the money to buy, however, so I then down until I finally sold for $1,400.

We had an auction and sold the personal property at a loss, so we got just about enough cash to pay the auctioneer; the wife and I then moved.

The horses brought about two-thirds what they were worth. The implements were sold for thirty cents on the dollar. Some amusing contortions generally take place before this little difficulty is overcome, and it is well to ask the question is illustrated by Fig. 2.

Kitty, In Her Own Language, Testified to the Generosity of the Mayo Brothers.

An Indianapolis woman who recently returned from Rochester, Minn., where she was taking treatment of the Mayo brothers, tells the following story of a farmer who was visiting in the city.

"I said this pack was given to the city by the Mayos!" he exclaimed.

"And the Mayos gave this library to the city, and the money for this school was contributed by the Mayos," informed his host, as they speed about the city seeing the sights.

"Well, that is wonderful," said the farmer. They certainly have made Rochester. Here comes a cat. I suppose that belongs to the Mayos, too. Let's stop and ask it."

"Say, Kitty, who do you belong to?" "Meow," replied the cat.—Indianapolis News.

The Captain's Wishes

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1916, by W. G. Chapman.)

"O don't mind father. He's partly deaf, you know. Elise, and he doesn't hear much of his conversation."

Captain Paul's daughters were having an afternoon party in the house on the hillside, overlooking the sea. The Captain had retired with a competence ten years before, but it had been hard-earned, and he and half a dozen times he had lost all in ship wrecks and started life again. And his wife had not lived to see the prosperity which at last came to him. He behaves like one. I wish he did—that's what I wish."

Her voice broke down and she began to sob. "He's a disgrace and a nuisance," she declared. "I wish—I wish I had my life to live over again without million dollars."

"You can't improve his manners, dear?" asked Myra's friend.

"Improve a cur's manners!" sniffed Mrs. Jobling at her eyes. "He doesn't know what manners mean. He was not in the Navy and somehow he can't behave. Only the other day he told Mr. Jones-Frothingham that they'd go out together sometime on a—Oh, I can't say the vulgar word. Exit."

"Tell me, I may have heard it," said Myra, with a smile at the thought of up-things, you know."

"I'm sure I don't, I meant a drunken amusement of some kind, I know. And he drinks gin instead of whisky, I believe. I wish he would not, for, once mixed, it is almost as vulgar." He came home one afternoon last week bearing his daughter's words, but greeted with a calm smile the wrath of his wife. That was not Myra. His daughter and he had always been the best of friends, and he understood the cause of little thoughtlessness on her part toward him.

"You can't make me believe that, ma'am," he said to the fairy, who had somehow grown from a little to a richly, if visible though she was, "that Miss Myra, the best lady in the world, sent you to me."

"I choose your third wish, then," said the fairy curtly.

"In a moment, ma'am," answered Captain Paul.

"Why not now?" asked the fairy. "Because this is mighty good liquor, ma'am," replied the captain, "and I guess when you take that dream away you'll take the drink away with it."

And, chuckling over the trick which he had played upon the fairy in his own heart, the old man slipped his gin glass from her hand, and, standing a fuming, baffled presence at his side.

"You, ma'am," he said, "when he had finished, "I'm going to make my third wish. But I'm going to think hard before I make it, so don't be in a hurry last. I'm not going to get tucked up in bed for a long time yet, I'm sure, days. If I was to wish what's in my mind, I'm afraid you'd be vexed, so I'm not wishing it—I'd wish to be a young man of twenty-five, handsome and better educated than any man I've ever seen, with Mary at my side, just standing to me, and a large yacht and a yacht and an automobile, and nothing to do, and a thousand men to be servants, and Mr. and Mrs. Jones-Frothingham begging for the honor of filling my pipe with Latakia Grade 1, and a fine cellar of old wine with sweet on the footing, and—and—but I ain't wishing those things, I'm wishing something else. Wait, I'm not ready yet. Don't be in a hurry."

It seemed so real to the Captain at the time that he at once began wishing.

"Well, ma'am," he said, "I wish that I could be a young man again, thirty years from now."

Captain Paul rubbed his eyes. To his amazement he found himself seated at the table in his own dining room. He felt, he did not recognize—he felt, he was a young man. He looked at his collage on the Rhode Island shore. Something had gone from his breast as tracted his attention. It was his beard, which he had worn long in those days. It was gone. He felt a pang of regret.

"Why, I wish I didn't wish myself home again!" he said thoughtfully. "And—and—"

"He won't care. He's an old dear!"

It was Myra's voice. And suddenly she was standing at his side, her arms about his neck.

"I said you're an old dear, papa, and I meant it, too," she cried, hot-cheeked. "I'm sorry I ever let Jones recite. Why, papa, you look as if you had been to sleep!"

"I guess I have," said Captain Paul. "But you—I just sat down with that fairy and I'll. No, never mind, my dear. It was just an old man's dream."

Tear Down—Build Up.

"The old gardener was on his knees in the lawn digging up dandelions. As he drew each long, slender root from the soil he dropped something into the hole which it had left. "What are you doing?" said a "Dropsy." he replied. "Dropsy?" he answered. "Dropsy is a disease, isn't it? Why, what

NEW AUTO LAWS.

The secretary of state has compiled, in pamphlet form, the new motor vehicle law, which takes effect in January.

The most important change is in the method of taxation. Under the new law, cars will be taxed as follows: Gasoline and steam cars, 25c a horse-power and 25 cents a hundredweight, electric cars, $1.00 a horse-power and 25 cents a hundredweight.

Gasoline and steam power trucks, 15 cents a horse-power and 15c a hundredweight.

Electric trucks, 50 cents a horse-power and 25 cents a hundredweight.

Motorcycles, 25 cents a horse-power and 25 cents a hundredweight.

The weight is to be given by the manufacturer, with the car fully equipped.

The provision, with reference to chauffeurs, remains the same. Chauffeurs must be 18 years of age, and wear badges furnished by the secretary of state conspicuously.

Under the present law, rates are reduced Aug. 1, hereafter they will not be reduced until Sept. 1.

The provision with regard to non-resident grants them a period of at least thirty days upon a license of similar state or province from whence they come extend the same privilege.

An automobile may be equipped with a single light in front, or two, if desired, but the electric lights in front must be equipped with dimmers. It will be the duty of the driver of a car so equipped to dim his light when approaching other vehicles.

The right of civil action in case of accidents is changed in that the owner shall not be liable after Jan. 1 unless his machine is being driven by his express or implied consent.

MILFORD GETS PLUM.

Ex-School Commissioner Milford is now realizing that his effort at the county convention was a boosting in disguise for him, says the Hogue Citizen. He received an appointment from State Game Warden Oates which opens larger fields for his unquestioned ability which carries with it a large financial appreciation, that of Deputy Game and Forestry Warden. Mr. Milford has already entered upon his duties but will not assume the greater responsibilities of his work until September. At that time he will take up the educational phase of the conservation work, giving schools of instruction.

His work will be of the constructive nature, that of teaching fire prevention rather than fire fighting and teaching the reasonableness of the game laws, their necessity. Showing why they should be observed rather than prosecuting when they are broken.

The position is now held by McGillvray, who has visited this city on different occasions.

No man is more entitled to the appointment than is Mr. Milford, and no one more qualified for the work. He is naturally a constructive builder and his years of experience with schools will add to his value to the department as his work will largely be with the rising generation.

Traverse City Record: Joseph Rutner, of Detroit, Ariz., a former resident of this city, died at Loma Linda, California, July 22, after a long illness. He was born in Bohemia in 1864 and came to this country with his parents when five years of age. The first winter was spent in Chicago, after which they removed to Traverse City. He married Miss Louisa Goodman at East Jordan in 1885. They made their home in Traverse City until fourteen or fifteen years ago when they removed to a farm near Maple City. They made their home there for several years and then removed to California. Mr. Rutner's health being poor they removed to different places in the west, finally locating at Dissotti, Ariz., their present home. He was a member of several orchestras and led the Boys' Band while in this city. He was 58 years of age. He leaves a wife, two sons, Fred and Claire of Phoenix, ariz., his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Alois Rutner, of the city, and three sisters, Misses Anna, Frances and Mary, who make their home with the parents, 537 Fifth street. The funeral will be held from home, 537 Fifth street, tomorrow afternoon at 2:30, Rev. D. Cochlis officiating. Interment will be in Oakwood. Members of the First Boys Band will attend in a body.

A communication from the military department at Washington relative to the status of the Michigan National Guard is to the effect that by the end of the year the national guard must be increased so that each company will at least have three officers and sixty-five men. In the event that the number fails short National support will be withdrawn from all such companies. Should a single company of any one regiment not reach the standard the colonel commanding that regiment and his staff will be mustered out of the service because Washington would not consider the slim companies as constituting a complete regiment.

PUTS BAN ON SNOBS

Kansas Schools Will Drive Them From the State.

Useful Men and Women Rather Than Cultured Ones Is the Aim of Board of Education—Few Go to College.

Topeka, Kan.—Driving the snobs out of Kansas is the new cult undertaken by the state board of education. When the opening of the school year next fall the real work of making useful men rather than cultured men and women will be undertaken.

For six years R. T. Fairchild, state superintendent of public instruction, now head of the New Hampshire Agricultural college, fought the trend of education in the state that was making a race of snobs of the young folk. His successor, W. D. Ross, continued the fight for three years before he was able to break through the "culture crust."

A great many parents and nearly every high school teacher have for years encouraged the elderly people in rural studies in the high schools. The colleges of the state have for years urged the high schools to install courses in the arts and sciences that would lead to admission to colleges. That attitude caused the high schools to become preparatory institutions for colleges rather than training schools for citizenship as a rule. The reason for it was this idea that Fairchild and Ross fought continually for the past years, is now they have the entering wedge to break down the culture system in Kansas.

"Only a small percentage of the boys and girls who graduate from the high schools are able to go to college," said Mr. Ross. "This has been the observation of many men that the high school studies lead more to culture than to general efficiency. It is more proper that the children should study Latin and French and learn other culture things that make for culture and for high intellectual attainments.

"But along with these there ought to be some practical everyday work. Few of the boys and girls ever did get an industrial training than the high school, and the training they do get should be the most useful to them. In every way that it is possible for the state to give.

"Annual sectional meetings of a boy or a girl an incentive to good work, not only in his vocational studies, but in the national ones as well. If vocational work does nothing more than reduce the snobbery it will have accomplished a great deal.

"A few years ago there were no snobs, because everyone appreciated what constitutes good work. Many children now have no conception of what constitutes good joinery or good welding and they have no appreciation of the actual worth of a man who builds a good machine.

"A girl who herself made a dress or who took a prize for cooking knows the value of another woman who makes artistic clothes.

"The state board of education is making a complete survey of the course of study in high schools. The new order of things goes into effect with the opening of the schools next fall. There will be marked increases in the vocational training and the boys and girls will be required to take the vocational work whether they expect to go to colleges or not.

"The high schools of Kansas will be managed upon the theory that they are training schools for young folks for good citizens, good workers, good wives," is the announcement of the board.

Four inspectors, who will see that the work is properly carried on, and $50,000 in cash bonuses from the state will be given to high schools with complete vocational courses.

PICKING OFF THE ENEMY

A detail of German sharpshooters suns an image from behind the shelter of a ruined factory close by the banks of a stream in the north of France.

Wanted to Be Hopelitable.

When I went to Fairbanks with Gen. Horace Porter, I told my friends that any of them who got within a mile of the embassy must come to see me. The latchstring, I told them, was out; there was always a spare seat in my pew at church. The latchstring was often pulled; the seat in church remained vacant. One of my friends who visited me and knew the geography of Paris, suggested that I should hang my latchstring on the door of the Madeleine church, which I did. Nobody came near me. Nobody came to church with me. I felt lonesome. I felt that I was not hitting the mark I had set for myself. I felt that I was not hospitable. I felt that I was not living up to the reputation I had made for myself in the West. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Colorado. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Washington. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Fairbanks. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Paris. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Rome. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Vienna. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Berlin. I felt that I was not the man I had been in London. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Edinburgh. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Dublin. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Belfast. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Liverpool. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Manchester. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Boston. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Chicago. I felt that I was not the man I had been in Denver

SYNOPSIS.

Hall Bonistelle, artist photographer, prepares for the day's work in his studio. He is reminded by Flute Fisher, his assistant, of a party he is to give in the evening. Hall dashes out to attend to business in a bad financial state. Mr. Freeman, attorney and justice of the peace, calls and informs Hall that he has married Miss Rosalind Royalton, before his twelfth birthday, when boating at moonlight that night.

CHAPTER II—Continued.

Flodie tried to speak, hesitated, couldn't. "I—think so—" she finally got out. Then, timidly, "Yes, I'm sure she would."

"By jove, I'll try it!" he exclaimed. "Who is she?"

Flodie almost broke down. She crept up to him timidly. "Why—why, you know, Mr. Bonistelle, don't you?—why, you made her!" Her eyes—she dropped and swallowed—"someone you see—all alone. She couldn't look him in the face, but stood waiting fearfully, troubling.

"Lord, I could do it!" Hall went on to himself. "Four millions! Behave midnight! He sauntered, gazing at a corner of the ceiling. "Oh, by jove!" he exclaimed suddenly, "I know now! You mean Rena Royalton! Why, I never thought of her, before! Of course. Yes, that's a fact! She did call me Hall the last time I saw her; didn't she?" He turned to Flodie. "See here, Flodie, you're clever—how the deuce did you know?"

Flodie colored at her heart and bit her lip to keep back the tears. He put it to her direct! Was it Mrs. Royalton, Flodie?"

Flodie's smile was a triumph; it had in it a dozen different meanings, it was wonderful in its beautiful reunciation; but it took a full minute for her to control herself, and meanwhile, she busied herself with the tray.

"Yes," she managed to say finally, and choking, she walked rapidly back into the office.

Hall stood and thought it over. He took out his watch and looked at it anxiously. It was already ten o'clock. Once he shook his head. It was too outrageous; then the humor of the affair seized him and he laughed harshly, aloud.

Flodie's white face appeared in the doorway. "What's it?" she cried.

"I've got it!" he shouted, "we'll have a wedding tonight. The guests are invited already, and they can't get quietive, installed. Finally he sat down beside her on the couch under the window, stretched out his hand, obtained hers without much trouble, and fell of it softly. She stared at him excitedly.

"You know, Rena, the reason why haven't been to see you, don't you?"

"Oh, some other woman, I'm sure."

"No; I just didn't dare. I hadn't the courage."

She drew her hand away, but permitted it to be reassured with ease. "You must know what I've been thinking," he went on. "You must have seen it in my eyes."

"Why, your eyes look all right, Mr. Bonistelle. I haven't any idea what you're talking about!" She was a forty-year-old baby, now.

"I wish I could see some of it in your eyes, Rena!"

"What's the matter, child? Been reviving, haven't you? What in the world does a young girl like you have to trouble you?"

"Oh, waiting on customers, for one thing!" Flodie tossed her head like a filly.

Mrs. Royalton didn't apparently get the services. "Well, you don't seem to wait on them very much, Jan't Mr. Bonistelle ready for me yet?"

Flodie started to reply, then changed her mind. "I don't know," she said. "I'll see."

Hall was blinking from the dark room, loaded plate-holders in hand.

"Oh, Mr. Bonistelle," Flodie whispered despairingly, "you aren't going to propose to her, are you? Oh, don't, don't, please, Mr. Bonistelle!"

"Well, what's the matter now? I thought you wanted me to."

"Oh, but I don't now!"

"Flodie! You're crazy! Don't you worry! It'll be a happy day for your little girl, when I'm married! I'll see that you get a better job than that. Say, where's that other plate-holder?"

"Over on that shelf. Oh, Mr. Bonistelle, you'll be awfully unhappy! I know you will!"

He stopped impatiently.

"Unhappy! With four millions, Flodie? With a private mansion, country house—a villa in Italy, perhaps—automobiles—a valet—by jove, I guess not!"

Her face was absurdly distorted with pain and anxiety. Her fate were clouded. She summoned her courage for the last despairing stroke. "Oh, she—plain, Mr. Bonistelle! She patted her face like a crown! You wouldn't—"

Hall laughed aloud. "For heaven's sake! Is that what's troubling you? Now, I suppose she's the only woman who does it in all New York! Well, put your mind at rest, Flodie; I'll promise to surprise her after we're married. Tell her to come in."

Mrs. Royalton wandered into the studio. She began, as usual, with a simper and a smile. "I don't know that I ought to shake hands with you, Mr. Bonistelle! You're a bad, bad boy! Why haven't you been to see me, all this long while?" She filled the place with her dulcet personality.

Hall inspected her sagely, as one inspects a valuable object he is expecting to purchase, seeing her as it were, for the first time. His first remark backed conviction. "Oh, I've been busy, Rena!" That "Rena" barely saved it.

"Busy! Oh, you've always too busy for poor little me! I'm sure you'll take a special picture of me—and I did so want to get a good one today! Mrs. Royalton rattled on, taking off her veil and inspecting her hair in the cheval glass. She twitted him on his impulsiveness, she made her her own bonnet. She did the spoiled child ultimitably.

Hall said seemed distrait. He broke away nervously and went to work. It was his custom to engage his object in conversation, permitting her to change position, talk, drink tea, flirt, or gesture as she would, while she was unaware, and before she began to wonder why he did not begin, to have managed the exposure of some dozen plates, from one or two of which he was pretty sure to achieve a triumph of art and naturalness.

But, at the mercy of his obsession, this method was impossible today. Hall was too busy making up his mind, and could not do two things at once.

"You're not paying a bit of attention to me," she pouted, at last.

"Yes, I'm Sure She Would!"

the tiffs. How that? Won't that be great? Flodie Fisher, you've saved my life!"

He grabbed her and whirled her round in a crazy waltz till she broke away in anguish. "Oh, my hair! stella," she began. "I'll just have to tell you. I can't bear it—I'm—"

At that moment there was a sound of the hall door opening.

"What is it?" Hall said. "Anything I can do for you? Want to be a prima maid, or what?"

Flodie turned, looked, and raw. "Oh, nothing!" she put her hand to her head, as if it were aching. "There she is, now!" she sighed. "Mrs. Royalton!"

"Good! Tell her I'll be ready in just a minute!" Hall rushed into the dark room to load his plate-holders.

Flodie went wearily into the office with a curt "Good morning, Mrs. Royalton," and made a brave attempt to smile.

CHAPTER III.

Mrs Royalton was plump and fair-boyant, handsome if one didn't mind her pop eyes, which were brown and brilliant. She was a sleek and glossy woman dressed in the extreme of style, apparently quite assured of her own charms. Her motions were piano antly slow—she moved about with a stately swanlike carriage. Her vocal tones, too, were slow and smooth; full of a sort of sentimental suffering, as if she had to speak, hesitated, couldn't. "I—think so—" she finally got out. Then, timidly. "Yes, I'm sure she would."

"By jove, I'll try it!" he exclaimed. "Who is she?"

Flodie almost broke down. She crept up to him timidly. "Why—why, you know, Mr. Bonistelle, don't you?—why, you made her!" Her eyes—she dropped and swallowed—"someone you see—all alone. She couldn't look him in the face, but stood waiting fearfully, troubling.

believe it! When did you first discover that you loved me, Hall?" she mused, drawing nearer.

This stopped him for a moment. "Why—since—since—the second time, I think it was—"

"You think it was! You mean that time you came to dinner? Why! I thought you were much more interested in Carolyn Dailys!"

"Don't you believe me, Rena? I tell you, I can't stand it any longer. I've simply got to have you. Don't say no yet—just listen! Give me some encouragement, Rena, just a bit!"

She looked at him with immense delight. "You poor boy." Softly she patted his hand.

"Then you do like me a little, Rena?" He seized her hand firmly.

Rena was pleased and happy, radiant. "To think that you're in love with just poor little me!"

"Then you will say yes—and make me the happiest man in the world—the richest man in the—"

Mrs. Royalton would squeeze every precious drop out of the orange. "Do you really love me so much?"

"Oh, do I! Why, Rena, I simply can't wait—I want to marry you immediately—as soon as possible—today even—"

Rena rose. "Oh, that's impossible!" her voice lost its unction and became immediately matter-of-fact. "Don't be silly, Hall. Why, I haven't said 'yes' yet! I must have time to think it over."

"Time!" Hall's face dropped.

"I want to be sure, this time!" She shook her head in swift retrospection.

"Don't torture me, Rena! You know how I must suffer. Think of my being deprived of the opportunity of—"

Of what? Again her cowlike gaze disconcerted him.

"Oh, of everything—of you—of happiness—of—you know!" He looked at her helplessly. She still smiled, proud of his ardor. Something in her face—of a contemptuous kind, put a spur his art sense. Hastily he put his arm about her shoulder, tried to draw her closer, had his lips ready for the kiss, when she sprang up.

Largest Rose 19 Inches.

R. S. Hertle Haugh, a rose enthusiast of Ontario, Cal., is displaying a bloom of the William Sisson variety which measures six inches in diameter and nineteen inches in circumference. The rose is perfectly formed and fragrant. Mr. Haugh declares that a fertilizer of rotted plants in paringa was responsible for the mammoth blossom. In color it "is of a delicate shade of pink.

He's Only a Volunteer.

"Where do we find the most miserable of men?" exclaimed the exhorter fervently.

"You don't have to look far on the rear seat," responded the man in the fourth row, center, "he hunts you up and tells you all about it."

Attractive Veils.

A big square veil with a hole cut out of the center—that's the new sanpan. One of the most convenient and most graceful veils ever draped over a man's hat. Of course the hole is not left with raw edges to fray out, a very thin elastic is run through the tissue of hem, all around the circle and all one has to do adjust the veil over the hat is to stretch the elastic until it has snugged around the base of the crown.

Then the veil falls over the hat brim in easy, careless folds with the four corners of the big square coming at back, front and sides. These new sanpan veils are bound to be the rage for summer wear.

Not Original.

Not casting reflections on the girl who has invented a gown that can be worn by any woman anywhere, so merely wish to remark that, considering the taste of her time, Eve made the same invention some 6- years ago.

Crowded Out.

"I understand you are planning a new house."

"I started to."

"Why did you stop it."

"I didn't drop it. My wife and the contractor got together and I haven't been able to put in a word since."

IT WASN'T THE SAME WOMAN

Nevertheless, the British Soldier's Desire to Marry Lasted Through the Year of Probation.

There is a famous British general who hates to see his soldiers wed. One day a Tommy came to him and asked permission to marry.

The general, hoping to cool the man's ardor, told him to go away and come back again a year from that day, and if he was then in the same mind permission would be given him to marry. When the year had passed the soldier repeated his request.

"But do you really still wish to marry?" asked the general in surprise.

"Yes, sir, very much!" answered Tommy.

"Well, you may marry now," said the general. "I never believed there was so much constancy in man or woman."

The soldier saluted and prepared to leave the room, but when he got to the door he turned around and said: "Thank you, sir, but it isn't the same woman."—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

One of the Many Taffeta Gowns for Midsummer

This dress of royal blue taffeta is one of the best and most attractive that have appeared among a great number of models employing this silk. It is of that variety called chiffon taffeta, and is the coolest and crispest of gowns for midsummer, outside the world of wash fabrics.

The skirt has a plain fitted yoke extending to the hips, to which the body is sewed. This latter is made of the silk laid in close, single box plaits and is finished with a two and one-half inch hem at the bottom. Three rows of stitching, set close together, and parallel to each other, sew the plaits down at the top to the yoke and make a neat finish. The hem is also machine stitched.

The coat is cut with a plain yoke also. The lower edge of the yoke is cut in shallow curves with an inconspicuous point at each side on the bust. The point reappears in the center of the back. Reversing the order of things in the skirt, the yoke overlaps the plaits in the jacket and but two rows of stitching are used in joining it to the body. A rolling collar and turned-back cuffs, as plain as can be, take care of the finishing of neck and sleeves. A plain belt made over a crinoline foundation, three inches wide, is tacked on the jacket a little below the normal waist line. It is ornamented with three ball buttons at the front. They are fastened on with the silk, and two of them are used on the cuffs in the manner shown in the picture. White ball buttons of composition are effectively used on gowns of blue or black taffeta, and might be substituted for those that are silk-covered, to add snap to this trim suit.

The neck is much improved by a collar of white pique, or one of organdie, which rolls over the coat collar and fulfills its mission of placing white next the throat and face.

A bag of mallines and velvet, with white satin flowers and small feather cockade at the front, and a purse of dark blue leather, banded with white, are accessories that add tone to a dress that is distinguished by very clever designing. It seems very simple but the best of talent is required to achieve simplicity and distinction at the same time.

Graceful Finish.

Cerise, turquoise and violet are shades which are relieving the sombreness of many gowns, and on so many of the evening dresses for young people the garlands of small flowers make a graceful finish either on flounces or above them.

Attractive Hats That Mamma Can Make

Not much that is new may be said about the hats for little girls, since mothers have been almost of one mind in selecting bonnet like shapes for the fair little sons of their daughters. But here is something new in a soft hat of ribbon, and also a remodeled hat with broad brim and lace crown, which the home milliner will enjoy making for herself or her little daughter, and to put his arm about her shoulder, tried to draw her closer, had his lips ready for the kiss, when she sprang up.

OLD AND CURIOUS CLOCKS

Marvels of Workmanship Were Some of Those Products in the Centuries Gone By.

While the clockmakers of today possess skill and ingenuity to the highest degree, the clockmakers of other days showed great ability in their line, since the product of their t bors was frequently not only of the most complicated sort, but of such perfect workmanship that it seems to have been made for all time.

In this relation there may be mentioned a clock at Castelnou, in the Isle of Man, that was telling the hour before Oliver Cromwell was born, and there is a clock still marking time at Lanzo Hussen which Queen Elizabeth herself presented to the lord of that castle more than 300 years ago.

There are other clocks of even more ancient date. At Schraubeg, in the Tirolese forest, there is to be seen an alarm clock that was made in 1680. It is still in good working condition. In form it resembles a lantern, wherein is a lighted candle, the wick being automatically dipped, every minute, by a pair of scissors. The candle is slowly pushed upward by a spring, which also controls the mechanism of the clock, and at the required hour of waking an alarm is sounded, and at the same time the movable sides of the lantern fall and the room is flooded with light.

Not so long ago the French government acquired from a private collector an extraordinary clock that once belonged to Napoleon Bonaparte. This not only indicates the time of day, but the day, the month, the year, the mean solar time, the phases of the moon, and, in addition, the quarter-hours. Its attachments include a thermometer.

One of the most curious of clocks was that made for the Duke of Milan. It was constructed of bread. Every day the maker set apart some flour of his mill, and made of it a promise of which he would not dishonor his word, and was able to render as hard as metal. From these fragments of bread he then constructed the clock, which he said to be an excellent one, keeping good time.

A man named Le Gaillard, living at Limoges, France, is recorded as being able to make clocks from any kind of wood, no matter how unsuitable it may have seemed. One clock in fashionable mahogany, for one of its parts converted into pulp; another in ebony, which was broken up and together by wire; a third from discarded tobacco cans and so on. Some of Le Gaillard's clocks are said to have been models of workmanship.

A Changed Paris.

"Paris considers itself safe now, and, like an invalid that has been ill, is able to sit up and see a few friends." The Pollen Reporter! How like old times! Surely you won't be able to help laughing there! In that blue and impossible sunlight, there is a dry laugh or two occasionally, mostly their dream at the cafe tin. Comedy scenes go for nothing—men rise, yawn, and walk out, in this a dress rehearsal, college boys theatricals, or what? The house drifts further and further away until suddenly—the Marseillaise! and the crowd is on its feet, electrified, joining in the chorus shouting "Vive la France!" With the waving tricolor for a spur the show picks up for a while until a shudder runs through the spectators—oh, that they beyond still to the chorus! And now the women leave: their faces are a little white.

"No, the city has little appetite for tragedy; it is gripping realities—a myriad pleasant treats keep Paris busy. And as the trained nurse in the operating room does not laugh at ask questions, but silently passes the instruments, so anxious, obedient Paris is straining every nerve to assist the surgeon, and has no thought for anything but war. And, strangelated by its great peril that thought has been so concentrated by suffering, by sacrifice, and service, that Paris has been lifted into a new order of being. It has gone on. It has gone up."—Estelle Loomis in the Century.

The King of Italy.

King Victor Emmanuel III is a curious mixture of the democratic in manners, which he inherited from Savoy and the strict training of military discipline, which he got from his mother. He is said to have announced that "I am the King of Italy and I obey." The tradition of the Savoy and kings has been rather that of a monarch more than that of division of skill, but in the case of the present king a fairly long tenure of a throne more secure than that held by his father and grandfather and the very tying influence of Rome have formed a more courtly bearing. Yet he does seem to have inherited that avoiding for ceasing to be the king in order to become the man and the brother. King Victor, barrely mustached, if of few inches, moves like a thunderbolt among men and women of whom he knows any of those manifestations of nobility—restlessness which torment the people of the peninsula. He arrives at a decision and is off, "all over" the stricken district. That counts a good deal.

Beauty's Bare-faced Pomp.

"It is a healthy human impulse to deck itself in flowers." Clare. And there is, indeed, a barefaced pomp of beauty—beauty that cannot enter a room without giving the whole house a shock; beauty that, like a Spanish dancer, stamps his foot, sings to the tambourine, and rattles castanets. Beauty that, with a sweep of the eyelashes, sends every rich man in the country flying to the nearest florist's shop.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

by George V. Hobart

John Henry on Goat Getting

HIS HARDY'S goat belongs to the chamois branch of that famous family.

When it gets out it wants to leap from crag to crag.

Hep's chassis got loose recently and, believe me, I never saw a goat perform to better advantage.

For a long time Hep has been in love with Clarissa Goober, the daughter of Pop Goober, who made millions out of the Flowerpot Trust. Of late, however, Hep's course of true love has been running for Sweeney, and my old pal has been staring at the furniture and conversing with himself a great deal.

On our way home night before last Hep and I dropped into the Saint Aesthetics for a cocktail, and at a table near us sat Pop Goober and something else, which afterward turned out to be a Prussian nobleman — the Count Cheese von Cheese.

When Hep got a flash of these two his goat kicked down the door of its stall and began executing all over the Western Hemisphere.

"Pipe!" he whispered, hoarsely "pipe Pop Goober and the human germ with him! It's a titled foreigner, so honest it is! I've seen it with my pa!" And it is trained to pick out a millionaire father-in-law at fifty paces!"

"Why, what's the matter, Hep?" inquired John, after the waiter had vamped.

"Oh, I'm wise to these parlor snakes! The Gorgonzola Gulch all stopped up in pink tissue paper and only $5 in the chest! Clarissa Goober! Gone in the direction of the Count Cheese von Canoes."

"Pop Goober certainly does make both ends meet in the 'emon industry," he continued. "That old girl is the original Onion collector and he spends his waking hours falling for dead ones."

Hep paused to bite the froth off a frappe. His goat was at the post.

"That dribbler is over here to pick up our bonds and fall in love with her because he sends the money," Hep growled as his goat got away in the lead. "Every steamer brings them over, John, some incognito, some in state rooms, and some in box stateroom, and all of them able to pick out a lady with a bank account as far as the naked eye can see.

"Usually I root for you, John, that an occasional American baron has to kick four Dukes, eight Earls, seven Counts and a couple of Princes in front of him at the finish. Now, I root for the foreign nobleman, the Count Cheese von Cheese, and I root for Clarissa Goober, the daughter of Pop Goober, who made millions out of the Flowerpot Trust. Of late, however, Hep's course of true love has been running for Sweeney, and my old pal has been staring at the furniture and conversing with himself a great deal.

On our way home night before last Hep and I dropped into the Saint Aesthetics for a cocktail, and at a table near us sat Pop Goober and something else, which afterward turned out to be a Prussian nobleman — the Count Cheese von Cheese.

When Hep got a flash of these two his goat kicked down the door of its stall and began executing all over the Western Hemisphere.

"Pipe!" he whispered, hoarsely "pipe Pop Goober and the human germ with him! It's a titled foreigner so honest it is! I've seen it with my pa! And it is trained to pick out a millionaire father-in-law at fifty paces!"

"Why, what's the matter, Hep?" inquired John, after the waiter had vamped.

"Oh, I'm wise to these parlor snakes! The Gorgonzola Gulch all stopped up in pink tissue paper and only $5 in the chest! Clarissa Goober! Gone in the direction of the Count Cheese von Canoes.

"Pop Goober certainly does make both ends meet in the 'emon industry," he continued. "That old girl is the original Onion collector and he spends his waking hours falling for dead ones."

Hep paused to bite the froth off a frappe. His goat was at the post.

"That dribbler is over here to pick up our bonds and fall in love with her because he sends the money," Hep growled as his goat got away in the lead. "Every steamer brings them over, John, some incognito, some in state rooms, and some in box stateroom, and all of them able to pick out a lady with a bank account as far as the naked eye can see.

"Usually I root for you, John, that an occasional American baron has to kick four Dukes, eight Earls, seven Counts and a couple of Princes in front of him at the finish. Now, I root for the foreign nobleman, the Count Cheese von Cheese, and I root for Clarissa Goober, the daughter of Pop Goober, who made millions out of the Flowerpot Trust. Of late, however, Hep's course of true love has been running for Sweeney, and my old pal has been staring at the furniture and conversing with himself a great deal.

MRS. BECKER'S BRAVE BATTLE

Courageous Woman Did Everything to Save Her Husband.

TAUGHT SCHOOL TO ASSIST

In the End She Finds Her Home Gone and Mother and Baby Dead—Buried Up Crooked Man Until His Was in the Very "Valley of the Shadow of Death."

Hick of Charles Becker's tenderloin gang for the murder of Herman Rosenthal, the gambler, was saved from the electric chair by the action of his wife, Lucy Becker, his wife. In the final analysis it was an example of the pet maxim of men of sense for women and women for men. With elemental strength and courage the woman fought for her mate against the powerful hand of the state which took his life for planning and ordering the killing of that gambler.

When Becker first was trapped she went to his assistance without delay. When the news that a second trial had been granted came to her inside her mother's cell she stood and in joy fainted. Twice Lawyer Shay, who brought the news, with a kiss. The wind of the courage flowed from her seeking the governor to plead for mercy.

There have been hints of secret defense funds raised by the gamblers and by gamblers. However, so far as positive information goes, Mrs. Becker, but for the help of Police Lieutenant John Becker and Jacob Becker, brothers of her husband, has fought practically alone.

At the outset of the contest she had money. Becker was credited with a fortune made by his levies on chief of the "crooks" gang. At the time of his arrest he had just completed, though he had not yet occupied, a handsome home at 2230 Olinville avenue, New York.

Success to Keep Up Fight.

What cash Mrs. Becker controlled was paid out in the first trial, which resulted in the first and only successful appeal. She then returned to work as a schoolmistress. After the second trial Mrs. Rosenthal was pledged for counsel fees. A lawyer holds the mortgage. It is said that Mrs. Becker's only resource now is her position as a schoolteacher.

Mrs. Becker is a small but well proportioned woman in the thirties. Conventional river shows in her snappy, dark eyes, pleasant cheeks and strong, even contours.

In the three years of her husband's fight her remarkable courage has won praise from every quarter. Given the opportunity to study her under the most trying circumstances. The wife of "Dopey Jack" would not wipe the blood, the two convicted men who went to the chair, and their associates with bravery. Mrs. Herman Rosenthal, the Italian gambler's widow, was strong in her demand for vengeance. But Mrs. Becker under an agonizing strain of adversity showed a spirit of faith and fortitude that respelled admiration.

Kept Husband's Spirit Up.

Friends, who saw she kept up her courage and, beyond her husband's sagging spirits, kept his spirits at the moment as a support only Becker him knew. Mrs. Becker always carried a cheering smile into the death house at Sing Sing. Friends who visited her throughout the gloom of the condemned tier, she had a smiling word for every inmate of the place.

Martin T. Manton, counsel for Becker in the second trial and associated with Bourke Cockran in the legal moves up to the last, recently paid this compliment to Mrs. Becker:

"She is a wonderful woman. I have never known another who stood such a strain so bravely and so well. Mrs. Becker has undergone experiences which would have crushed almost any one."

Once a few days after Becker and then together.

"In the ten years of my married life, I have never had any reason to regret that I married Charles. He has been a splendid husband, and I would rather lose all the other members of my family. Of course my brothers and sisters are dear to me, and they have been splendid to me through all my trouble, but they are never more as much to me as my husband."

So far as her public expressions go she always has helped steadily for her husband's innocence. She had unbounded faith in his native force of character, for Becker had the sort of strength that served him well as chief of the one strong crap game in police headquarters. She always thought if Becker had taken the witness stand at his trials he would have forced his innocence upon the minds of judge and jury.

"He never had an opportunity to defend himself," she said once.

Tucks Discussed as Bushes.

Turkish subjects disguise themselves as bushes by tying shrubs to their backs and sometimes pelt themselves and their tribe cross.

Couldn't Take Their Loot.

Thieves who stole fifty rolls of linoleum by throwing it off a train in Indiana succeeded in carting away only eight rolls before daylight.

MACKINAC HAS QUIT

Unprofitable Season Is Given as Reason for Sending Boat Back to Owners.

Tonight the steamer Mackinac makes her last local trip, an excursion to Traverse Harbor, says the Traverse City Record, and at midnight she starts for Mackinac Island, where she will be laid up, as there is no business in sight.

Commodore E. A. Weston was notified yesterday by the officials of the Northern Michigan Transportation Co. to let the boat go. This is only one of a number of the steps toward economy that the company is compelled to take on account of the unprofitable season. If the company's own boat were making any money the Mackinac would have been retained, despite the local loss, but with a general deficit along the line a policy of retrenchment has to be adopted.

While the Mackinac has not paid expenses here, the company is not charging this up to lack of local appreciation. The northern has put a profitable crop in business out of the question. The short cherry crop has made the freight business a losing proposition. It cost nearly $1,000 a week to operate the Mackinac, yet she made some trips to Old Mission that brought in less than fifty cents in revenue from freight. With genial summer weather the passenger traffic might have helped keep the boat going, especially as Traverse City people were awakening to the advantages of the boat. The Mackinac were to run an excursion to Charlevoix next Monday, the Oval Wood Dish Co. and the Grullich Chair Co. were planning an excursion for their employes and different organizations were discussing trips to be called off. But the raw weather has kept them back. In addition to the generally bad season, the Kalkaska disaster has almost put an end to passenger traffic on the lakes and the company could see no way of making the Mackinac should be chartered at a daily loss, with no prospect of breaking even.

This afternoon the Arnold line, which owns the Mackinac, called up Mr. Weston by telephone and tried to have the boat continue its trips and offered better terms, but this back to the Indian Island, the boat cruising around Mackinac Island, and the Sion are all losing money and the Mackinac would be idle its very day in the summer. She was built originally to run between the island and Sioux Island, but had to be taken off that route as she drew too much water, so on other routes in the north country there is no opening for her.

The Northern Michigan Transportation Co. will make another bid for Traverse City business next year. If the season shows any promise at all for the company's line a boat will be sent on here. But if the main lines show heavy losses the company cannot make many experiments with small side lines.

HE MADE BEQUEST OF BRAIN

Man of Eminence Has the Idea of Advancing Scientific Study by the Action.

Announcement was made a short time ago that Dr. Leland O. Howard, chief of the United States bureau of entomology, had declared to the American Association for the Advancement of Science that he would bequeath his brain for scientific study to a school that specializes in entomology. A number of other scientists who attended the meeting expressed admiration for the doctor's action and are reported to be considering similar bequests of their own brains.

There was a British physician named Robert Peebles who created a sensation in London and Edinburgh several years ago by his insistent coaxing of athletes for the privilege of studying their bodies after death. He had been experimenting with the muscles and had arrived at what his associates termed a fantastic notion that some sort of operation could be performed on the legs of the human runner so that his speed could be increased. Leapers and high jumpers were his hobby, and in the course of five years it was estimated that he had examined the leg muscles of nearly a thousand men, making comparisons with the running and leaping muscles of the frog, the deer, the greyhound and other animals.

Perhaps was a man of means, and after he had succeeded in inducing half a score athletes of reputation to sell his their bodies the attention of surgeons was attracted. They took the matter under consideration at one of their quarterly meetings and warned Peebles that they would have him committed to a sanitarium if he continued his strange pursuit. Peebles threatened and they had a committee also appointed. While his sanity was in question the doctor died. He left his brain to the medical school.

War Hits Rheumatism.

Sufferers from rheumatism, in selling to the allies the frozen meat they had war it only cost 30 cents a pound, remarks the New York World. Also, it is cold in this country only under the condition that none of it will be exported.

The reason for this, according to the head of one of the largest chemical companies in the city, is not because there are more cases of rheumatism in this country today than ever before, but because sodium salicylate is made from carbolic acid and therefore imported from Europe. New Europe needs all her carbolic acid to use in manufacture of explosives.

Horace Greene of the Oil, Drug and Chemical Reporter said: "Nearly all the highly developed coal tar derivatives in the United States have been used up. Picric acid, which is used in explosives, costs all over in Europe to what it would cost to manufacture here. In England they are too busy to manufacture it, so they have been buying from us in great quantities. We have been selling at huge prices. Last year at this time carbolic acid cost seven cents a pound, now it has gone up to $1.50."

Drowning Season Here.

Don't rock the boat! It is not mere in a foolish sort of joke to do it; it is very frequently a murderous or suicidal idea. If you cannot swim do not wade out where the water is up to your chin. If you do, you may suddenly step into a hole that lifts the water above your mouth and nose. And when that happens the chances are large that it will be your funeral the next day or as soon as your remains can be found. Don't dive from a high place without being sure the water is not so shallow as to result in your head striking bottom. Don't crowd five people into a boat made for three, or three people into a boat made for two. Don't play foolish pranks such as pushing a boy who cannot swim into deep water. Don't get out on the bay in a small rowboat. A storm may come up and your small ship be capsized.

The drowning season is here. There has never been a summer within the memory of the oldest citizen of the city that has not been marked by drowning tragedies.

Doubtful About It.

Nath Taylor could neither read nor write, but he put one over on the city preacher that he managed to marry him. Nath had for a long time contemplated marrying but never had the nerve to inquire into the necessary legal formalities. A preacher from the city happened to be visiting on the farm where Nath was employed. When Nath learned of the presence of the preacher in the house he decided to go up and inquire just what had to be done. When Nath reached the front steps his courage left him, and there Mr. Smith, his employer, found him. Nath explained his mission and the preacher was called to enlighten him.

"And so you wish to get married, my man?" the preacher nodded encouragingly to Nath. whose courage was fast slipping away.

"Well, I think I will try it a while," Nath replied. "How much does it cost?"

Considerate Wife.

Senator John W. Weeks of Massachusetts smiled when one of a party in a Boston club alluded to hen-pecked husbands, and said that he was reminded of a man named Slater.

One afternoon Slater was having a little gabfest with an old acquaintance, when the latter spoke of married life and the beauty of having a happy home.

"That's where I have a whole lot to be thankful for," said Slater. "I have a wife who looks after me constantly as a matter of fact, there are times when she even takes off my shoes for me."

"If she," thoughtfully mused the acquaintance, "I suppose that is when you come home tired at night."

"No, no," smilingly corrected Slater. "It is when she thinks that I am about to slide out early in the evening."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

THE RIGORS OF BATTLE PRACTICE

While Uncle Sam has been so busily engaged in preparing for the contingencies in shape for any possible contingency or action during these days of small conflict abroad, Lyman H. Howe's photographers have been equally busy in filming U. S. Navy men in its entirely peaceful and unarmed activities. Beginning at the Brooklyn navy yard and ending in the dockyards of New York, Texas, and Wyoming were hurrying aboard ammunition and stores, the Howe cameramen, by special permission of the navy department, were constantly on the alert for striking moments during the eventful days. The reproductions to be presented at the Majestic Theatre on Aug. 16, 17 and 18 are unusually timely. They may simply because they are so absolutely representative of what goes on day to day life of American soldiers at sea. The desire of the navy department to give citizens generally a clearer knowledge of our navy prompted the special facilities given the Howe camera by the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Josephus Daniels. When the battleship fleet cleared for action and the big guns hurled giant projectiles at an imaginary foe, when submarines and destroyers fired torpedoes whose screws of the thousands of men engaged in battle practice were keyed to the great excitement—the Howe camera men were inuting on film every scene exacted about our dreadnaughts and super-dreadnaughts.

Habits That Induce Sleep.

Workers who sleep best are found to be those who eat active work and by no. Have a quiet supper after an out overexertion to force power, eat a light but well mixed nourishing supper of milk, vegetables, milk, cereals and sweets, and sit quietly in some open place, preferably or well ventilated building until 10 p. m.

LOOK TO YOUR DEEDS AND MORTGAGES

Among the new laws and amendments going into effect Aug. 15, 1915, are a number of changes with reference to deeds and mortgages. The following are especially pointed out:

All instruments conveying or mortgaging real estate of any interest therein, hereafter executed, shall state whether or not male grantors, mortgagors or other parties executing the same are married or single. Unless this provision is complied with, the register of deeds is forbidden to receive such instrument for record.

There are also many changes relative to chattel mortgages. Every chattel mortgage or conveyance intended to operate as a mortgage, when not accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change in possession shall be void as against the creditors of the mortgagor unless the mortgage or a true copy thereof is filed with the clerk of the township or city where the property is located and also where the mortgagor resides; when the mortgagor is a nonresident of the state the mortgage or a true copy must be filed with the clerk of the township or city where the property is located. An affidavit declaring it to be an actual bona fide transaction, otherwise the clerk cannot accept for record. There is an additional provision governing the mortgaging of a stock of merchandise or merchandise and fixtures or any part thereof purchased for resale at retail. Such instrument or a true copy together with the affidavit, shall also be filed with the county where the goods and chattels are located.

Whenever a chattel mortgage or a true copy is presented for record to the register of deeds, city or township clerk, such officer shall endorse thereon the time of receiving same and to deposit same in his office for the inspection of all persons interested. These officers shall also enter in a book provided by him for that purpose, the names of all parties to such instrument, arranging the names alphabetically and shall note the time of filing.

Such mortgages shall be void as against creditors of the parties making same within one year after the date of filing, unless within thirty days next preceding the expiration of the year the mortgagee, his agent or attorney file an affidavit setting forth his interest in the property.

There is also a new provision relative to unrecorded conveyances. Every conveyance of real estate in this state hereafter made, must be recorded with the proper officer or it becomes void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, of the same real estate or any portion thereof, whose conveyance shall be first duly recorded. The fact that such first recorded conveyance is in the form or contains the terms of a deed of quitclaim and release shall not effect the question of good faith of such subsequent purchaser, or be of itself notice to him of any unrecorded conveyance of the same real estate or any part thereof."

Cheerfulness.

Gentleness and cheerfulness, these come before all morality—they are the perfect duties. If your morals make you dreary, cancel upon it they are wrong. I do not say "drive them up," for they may be all you have; but remember, that a fine, lost they should spoil the lives of better men.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

WORMS CAUSE MANY CHILD REN'S ILLS.

Worms, by thousands, rob the child of nourishment, stunt its growth, cause Constipation, Indigestion, Nervousness, Irregular Appetite, Fever and sometimes Spasms. Kickapoo Worm Killer gives relief from all these. Good-health to one of these pleasant candy lozenges, taken as directed, kill and remove the Worms, regulate your child's bowels and restore its health and vitality. Get an original box from your Druggist. Don't endanger your child's health and future when so sure and simple a remedy can be had.

W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

The twenty-fourth annual convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Charlevoix county was held in the Presbyterian church at East Jordan, August 4th and 5th. Due to the rainy weather, there was a very small attendance but all delegates present were active in their work and interested in the coming campaign for statewide prohibition.

The program as printed was carried out with but few changes and was both spiritual and instructive. The president, Mrs. Gertrude Burdick, of Charlevoix, added many enthusiastic glimpses of western temperance work, as well as practical suggestions from the recent Harbor Springs Chautauqua. The union regrets that Mrs. Burdick expects to make California her home in the future. Charlevoix county loses an active worker and California gains a good citizen.

The following officers were elected for the coming year:

President—Mrs. S. J. Alcox, Charlevoix.

Vice-Pres. at Large—Mrs. E. E. Hall, East Jordan.

Corresponding Secretary—Mrs. Sara Wilkinson, Charlevoix.

Recording Secretary—May L. Stewart, East Jordan.

Treasurer—Mrs. Cory, Boyne City.

The honor roll of temperance workers has greatly increased during the past year. They stand ready to make Michigan a white ribbon state. Three cheers for Michigan "dry" in 1916.

GEORGE W. JARVIS, County Treasurer.

Boyne Citizen: Senator Mason, one of the great speaking men of the day, who spoke at the Chautauqua Saturday afternoon, has a weakness for fishing. To give the Senator a taste of real fishing, arrangements were made with Frank Hammond to accompany the Senator's mess of swordfish down the lake. They started immediately after the lecture and had hopes of a couple of hours of sport, plenty of time for Mr. Hammond at least to fill his limit. But, alas, fate in the shape of a gasoline engine was against the Senator. The blame thing wouldn't start, even if it was a real live U. S. Senator on board. It finally did wheeze and cough for a few minutes and carried the party as far as Horse Point where a shaft broke. Now, coasting a gasoline launch is no easy task and add to this the handicap of a half a ton of humanity and you have some job. The launch arrived here at nine o'clock, tired, sore and filled with anguish—and they hadn't done one bit of fishing.

Yesterday afternoon a delegation of business men met Dr. R. Roy Ridgely, of St. Petersburg, Fla., to discuss a proposition for starting a big summer resort hotel along the bay shore. Mr. Ridgely had previously conferred with some of the business men and his visit yesterday was for the purpose of presenting definite figures as to the cost of the enterprise and the prospective revenues from the various sources of income. The hotel would be pictures of southern hotels of this character and located on the bluff in the vicinity of St. Petersburg. This latter will have 200 rooms each with bath, be absolutely fireproof and cost in the neighborhood of $300,000 for stone construction. The cost of the same was estimated at $200,000 and the rates would be for from $5.00 to $8.00 per day, the idea being that travelers City should have the best resort hotel on the bay, and has any at all.—Traverse City Record.

The Ellsworth business men will give a free Barbecue to the people of the surrounding country on Wednesday, August 25, at Campbell's Park in town. It is the aim of the Ellsworth business men to make everyone who gets a piece of twenty miles attend and have the time of your life. Steers have been obtained from Petoskey and barbecued on a queen's taste and the committee consisting of N. R. Noland, D. E. Crane and J. H. Bishop are arranging a fine day's entertainment and program. There will be a stock exhibit. Arrangements are being made to have Hon. Gerrit Diekema of Holland, (maybe the next governor) with us. Also a fine ball game, band concert and various other amusements such as races and sports. Reserve the date. Wednesday, August 25, remember the place and meet all friends from all over at Ellsworth Barbecue.

Petoskey News: "We have just got to do something for Walloon Lake or we will lose a good share of the trade from that resort." and George Mullen Wednesday morning while discussing the plan for "doing something" for the resort, continued: "Walloon Lake is ripe for a good boost. Petoskey has just as fine a lake as any of the Michigan lakes. If we wish to keep what we already have to get the remainder we must do more than our summer residents and others there more than does Boyne City. Boyne City and Charlevoix are just enough to construct their good highways between Petoskey and Walloon Lake. Take so that people will have little chance to come to Petoskey. Petoskey has yet to build a road into this main highway if she wishes to get the trade away from those two cities."

TEACHERS' EXAMINATION.

The regular teachers' examination will be held August 12th to 14 in Charlevoix. Applicants taking papers for warded to other counties please write with pen. M. N. G. AT CAMP ABBEY

The Annual National Guard Encampment at Grayling a Great Success.

On Friday Gen. W. T. McCurrie, Commandant of the Michigan Soldiers' Home, Colonel of the 32d Infantry in the Spanish war, and former brigade commander, M. N. G., was in the city and joined the Sentinel scribe in the trip to Grayling.

En route Gen. McCurrie wired Brigadier General Kirk at Camp Abbey, and the former general and the scribe were met at the station, and in Gen. Kirk's car where whisked to camp, four miles away, where they were duly billeted a guest of brigade headquarters. But the first duty of the scribe was to hunt up Capt. Winters' Company L, 32d Infantry. Right here is where we want to say a few things about Co. L. Already the company from Charlevoix county—as a matter of fact is the talk of the regiment. In a field firing problem worked out Friday, with Flint, Big Rapids and East Jordan companies as competitors, Co. L, Charlevoix, was declared the winner. Major Frazier, of the field hospital corps told the scribe that Co. L had the only "decent" sanitary outfit in the regiment. The laconic remark of Dr. Frazier was "there is something right with Co. L!" At a regimental officers' meeting Friday Col. Boucher told the officers if they wanted to see a model company street to go down to Co. L. Already Capt. Winters and his company have earned the right to be called the color and snap of regiment, and "top" Sergeant Gulley has at one jump grasped all the details of the military routine. Co. L is already one of the best in the regiment, and with another year of training will be well up in front.

Sergeant Cook, of the regular army, who has been with Co. L as instructor since it was mustered in, returns to Fort Jordan with the company, and will for a month or two continue the "whipping in" process.

A shower was thrown over the camp Saturday morning in the death by drowning of an enlisted man of the Kalamazoo company. The soldier was bathing near the foot of Co. L street, when he was taken with cramps. He leaves a wife and five children.

Camp Abbey was named in honor of former brigade commander, F. L. Abbey, upon whose staff the scribe served for three years. The military reservation consists of 14,000 acres, embracing every topographical feature necessary for successful military work. The camp proper extends along the shore of Portage lake, a beautiful sheet of water about half the size of Pine Lake. It occupies ground of a gentle slope up from the lake. The ground selected plateau is established brigade headquarters, from which every part of the camp is visible. The tents are neat looking, the tents, while here and there old glory denotes regimental headquarters. Sentries surround the camp, and at stated hours one can see the relief squads posting the sentries. At five o'clock Saturday evening occurred infantry parade, in which the three regiments, headed by the 32d regiment band marched in review past brigade headquarters, with the sturdy soldier swing. It was a fine sight to see the good the pulse and sent a thrill coursing through the anatomy of at least one good American citizen. Then "treat" and guard-mount, and finally at 10:30 o'clock—all of the camp in full dress—the tattoo, the last call of the other came the trumpet notes of "taps."

Saturday night the scribe slept at Capt. Winters' quarters, arising at the first sound of reveille. A beautiful morning it proved to be. Sunday morning, Rev. Father Donnegan, the Catholic chaplain of the 32d, celebrated field mass at eleven o'clock. The Episcopal and Congregational chaplains of the 1st and 31, respectively, led the Catholic men of their regiments over to Father Donnegan's services and remained through the service. Knights were served as acolytes at the altar, and the splendid 32d regiment band furnished the music. The altar was improvised from two trunks, appropriately draped.

At ten-thirty Protestant services were held in the 1st and 31 headquarters, each with a band. In the midst of the services the brigade headquarters' gun roared seventeen times in honor of Gov. Ferris, who had just reached camp.

At three o'clock occurred the grand review of all the forces, a spectacle that again stirs up the patriotism of the beholder—approximately 3,000 men, ready at an hour's notice to march to the defense of the flag. The camp will close Saturday of this week.

SYNOPSIS.

Hall Bonistelle, artist-photographer, prepares for the day's work in his studio. He is visited by Florie Fairfax, who is a stranger to him, but who says she knew his father. Florie is a bit flustered when Hall, in boldness it is but fitting, kisses her. Mr. Royalston, attorney and justice of the peace, calls and interrupts Hall in his work. Royalston is worry before his lawsuit against that night. Mrs. Ross Rivington calls at the studio and Hall sends her to Harry John, assistant, who speaks for the CHAPTER III—Continued.

"Mercy, Hall! Not here! Not now! Not yet!" Mrs. Rivington's face flushed with shame and turned to look him over as he had looked at her. He looked as a woman looks at a hat in a milliner's, then shook her head as she spoke, not sure it was becoming. "No, Hall, I'm afraid I must have a little time. I really should have—"

"Rena?"

"No, Hall. You must be patient, dear. Give me a week—"

"Her here!" Hall spoke deliberately. "Will you be here tonight? You're coming to my party here, tonight, aren't you?"

"Why, yes. I was."

"Will you give me your answer then?"

She hung fire for a moment. Hall gave a gesture of impatience—was his supreme effort and had a touch of pathos. Mrs. Rivington, said, hesitated. "Well, then, all right, tonight."

Hall rifled again for an embrace, even while regulating him she let him—was her lion. Then she hurriedly pushed him away. "Oh, Hall, you mustn't! Not yet, anyway—you know I haven't accepted you, yet. Oh, I can't decide. I've got to think it all over calmly."

"Lord, not calmly, Rena!" he exclaimed. He gazed sadly at his shoes.

"He suppose you'd be terrible," he said, and with elaborate emphasis, "my darling."

"Oh, Hall! heart never was fair lady!" Mrs. Royalston seemed fully now in love with him whenever had come in. "Now, I must go, Hall. Good-by." She held out her hand, an empress to a slave. He kissed it with fervor. And with that she smiled, and walked out.

For ten minutes Florie had stood breathlessly by the door, trying to listen. She had barely time to spring back to her desk.

"Good-by, Miss Fisher!" Mrs. Royalston paused condescendingly. "I think if you used almond cream for your face it would do it a great deal of good. Try one of those wrinkle-bands, why don't you? They're really very efficacious." She swished into the dressing room to put on her veil.

Florie waited a moment in painful silence, then burst into the studio to find Hall caring in a stupor out the window. Again he pokers, a wont on his face. "What did she say?" she whispered. Hall didn't hear. "What did she say, Mr Bonistelle?" Florie was perishing of suspense.

Hall walked to the couch and dropped down, shaking his head. "She wanted time. Time! Confound it—the only thing I haven't got. What d'you think of that? I feel as if I'd done a week's washing! I'm all used up. Say, Florie, I taken lots of energy to propose, did you know that?"

Florie regarded him wistfully. "I should think it would—especially when you don't mean it."

"Oh, I mean it all right. I'll stand for it. Four millions! Lord, why wouldn't I mean it? I'd mean anything!"

"I mean when you don't really love her, Mr Bonistelle. I don't see how you could do it. I could never do anything like that!"

"Well, you ought to be glad you don't have to Florie. Unfortunate, I do. Why, she'll make a good wife, won't she? I don't say I love her, exactly; but, well, I've always liked Rena Royalston. She's a good fellow. She's got the looks, and the style, and the family connections and everything. I wouldn't be a bad husband of her at Mrs. Bonistelle. What's the matter with you, Florie? You look so queer! Ill or anything."

"Oh, I'm all right!" Florie smiled bitterly. "Quite—only—"

"Well, I'll be hanged! Why, anybody would think it was you who were in a hole, not me. Lord, I thought you cared enough for me to help me out!"

She moved instinctively toward him; instinctively she withdrew. "Oh, I do, really I do, Mr. Bonistelle. How can I help you? Tell me!"

"Well, what am I going to do if Mrs Royalton refuses me. By Jove! Just think of its being in that woman's power to cook me foot and a half in Ilona! It's outrageous!"

"Don't you let her, Mr. Bonistelle!" Florie broke out eagerly. "Oh, it isn't right. Money there's some other way a better way than that, Mr. Bonistelle."

"A better way? What d'you mean?" Hall looked at her, puzzled.

Florie seized on her a crage, and reached greedily for his hand. But, no, she didn't quite dare take it. He

LIKE A MOURNING DRAPERY

Interested Colored Spectators Brought Facetious Remark From Member of Their Race.

The dusky has a sense of humor peculiarly his own, and he by no means objects to a joke with reference to his color—provided he makes it himself, according to a story that was told in Swamp Chat.

"There is a darky in Missouri who has acquired considerable renown in his locality for his taste in landscape gardening. He has arranged the lawn in ling out shrubs on the lawn of his employer. The owner of the place was nowhere to be seen, but a number of the gardener's friends were leaning comfortably on the fence at the foot of the lawn, watching the operations with absorbed interest. Another fellow who was driver for a physician living near, looked curiously at this row of decorations and thus addressed the doctor, who was getting into his buggy:

"'Doctah' (very solemnly), 'dere's somebody dead at Mistah Jonas' shuh.'

"'Dead?' said the doctor. 'No such thing, Tom. I should have heard of it if there had been any illness in the family.'

"'Well, doctah,' said Tom, pointing to a row of sable individuals who were hanging on the picket fence, 'dere ain't nobody dead at Mistah Jones, dem what is fo all dis yeah mournin' sitting along de fence?'"

Summer Vogue of White Fur

If there is one thing in the world more becoming than all others, it is the white fur necklace. In spite of the calendar and with or without the consent of the thermometer, this necklace has flourished through July and shows an undiminished hold in August. Its vogue probably came about through the chilly weather in the early summer at San Francisco. All the sky world having journeyed thither, found a fur necklace comfortable. All the world recognized the becomingness of white fur and took heart at its appearance in the month of roses to make a vogue for summer furs.

Let us be thankful that the majority of the necklaces with which the wayward devotees of fashion have chosen to bedeck themselves are not really of white fur. They are as far from the fox as the goat is, or the Belgian hare, or whatever else those clever manipulators of skins know how to fashion into things of beauty. They would surely be few faces left if every white necklace cost the life of one.

These summer furs are worn with white turbans or small white hats, with best office, although they appear with all other midsummer millinery. In the picture a turban of white satin supports a frill about the crown which gives it the appearance of a Tam o'Shanter. At the left it is decorated with a bead ornament. The hat, the necklace, and the dress of cream-hue taffeta, made up with plain taffeta, are all forerunners of fashion and reliable indications of the coming mode. However unreasonable it may appear for the fair wearer of fur to cling to it when we even wind blows, she may be excused. A white fur necklace is really a good investment. The opportunities for wearing it stretch through this summer to the coming winter and to other winters beyond. White furs, especially for youth, will be good style, at least as long as any furs continue to be good style.

The Skeleton Petticoat

A flounce suspended by ribbons, to be worn in place of a silk petticoat, is the very latest device for comfort and style. Everyone wants the fashionable flare at the bottom of skirts, and everyone likes the elegance of silk in petticoats. But no one wants added warmth about the body, or bulk about the hips, and here is the solution to the flare without anything else to hamper its wearer.

The skeleton petticoat is merely a more or less fancy and fluffy flounce of silk suspended by ribbons from a ribbon belt. The very practical one shown in the picture is made of bright green taffeta ribbon suspended from a belt of the same ribbon which lies in a small bow about the waist. This is a good color to wear with almost any dress.

A petticoat of this kind to be worn with lingerie gowns is made of white taffeta in a flounce having decorations of flaxed taffeta. The flaxed taffeta—usually a flowered pattern on a white ground—is cut in strips two inches wide and "pinked" along each edge. These strips are sewed together and pasted into very full box plaits to form a narrow ruching. This is sewed in fancy to the white flounce.

The belt is made by covering a flat elastic cord with narrow taffeta ribbon of the same. The flounce is fastened to the flounce are sewed to this belt and to the flounce. No fastening is required, as the elastic cord holds the petticoat in place about the waist.

A similar petticoat is made of light shell-pink taffeta and satin ribbon, with narrow ruffles of the ribbon set on the flounce in three overlapping rows. The ways of developing the flounce with ribbon and lace decorations are innumerable.

This petticoat will commend itself to the stout woman especially, and to anyone who wishes to be as lightly clothed in warm weather as it is possible to be.

JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

Erect Figure Correct.

The fashionable girl of 1915 appears on the scene with a beautiful erect figure, a free swing to her walk and with elegance of sufficient width to permit her to be graceful in her carriage. The stooped shoulders with hand-bag forward and slouching gait once assumed by those who wanted to attain the extreme in chic, have entirely passed out, like an old-fashioned dress of several seasons ago, still be discarded by those who care enough for fashion to change their manner of carrying themselves.

To Mend Gloves.

To mend kid gloves satisfactorily remove all frayed edges with a small, sharp pair of scissors. Buttonhole firmly both edges to be mended with cotton thread (never use silk, as it rots), using a very fine needle. Then bring these edges together and button hole. A glove mended this way can then pull out or rip and will stand the hardest kind of wear. When the fastener comes off your glove pull out the other half of the fastener and sew a buttonhole. Or, a button and a piece of tape two inches long and one-quarter inch wide. Loop tape through two eyes of buttonhole, so that the ends have eyes on the back of button. Pass the ends through the hole left by the fastener, spread them out flat in front of button and sew securely both sides firmly. This method can be used in sewing buttons on a child's underwear.

SUIT FORTUNE ON THUMB

German Surgeon the Fortunate Possessor of Digit That Had Remarkable Peculiarities.

Not long ago a famous physician in Saxony, Doctor Metzger, celebrated his seventieth birthday. He had been retired from active practice for some years, owing to the fact that he had become immensely wealthy through the use of the wonderful thumb of his right hand. This thumb stands out at a right angle from his hand and, it is said, cannot be bent back automatically. He soon found it of great service in massage, and when he became a specialist in intestinal disorders he was called as assistant to the greatest surgeons of Europe, bringing relief to many illustrious patients.

The queen of Roumania sent for this doctor with the curious thumb when she suffered from facial neuralgia, while the king of Sweden once drove a beautiful span of horses over the border of his kingdom to consult the doctor and on returning left the horses as a token of gratitude to his preserver.

There was a time, early in his career, when the use of this curious thumb was looked upon as a form of charlatanism, but so well did Doctor Metzger establish his reputation that the medical profession accepted his thumb for what it was worth, without trying to explain the phenomenon.

He's only six years old, but he observes things. We heard his mother calling him down for rudeness at play, the other day, and our eavesdropping was rewarded with this:

on trial beside a package of any other corn flakes on the market. The jury will bring in a verdict of "guilty"—guilty of being the finest corn flakes ever made.

The New Post Toasties are crisp and appetizing, with a true corn flavour, and they don't mush down when milk or cream is added.

But here's the real test. Take a handful, fresh from the package, and eat them without cream or milk. Mighty good, aren't they?

Notice the little "puffs" on each flake—a distinguishing characteristic—resulting from the new method of cooking and toasting, which also brings out and enhances the wonderful, true corn flavour.

SEEING LIFE with JOHN HENRY

by George V. Hobart

John Henry on Dieting

I WAS complaining to some of my friends in the Club House yesterday about a form General Villa was storming the outposts of my digestive tract when a Nut in the party began to slip me a line of talk about a vegetable diet.

I didn't fall for it until he proved to me that Kid Methowbah had produced an otherwise unnatural life and was enabled to make funny faces at the undertakers until he reached the age of 900 simply because he ate nothing but dandelion salad, mashed potatoes and stewed prunes.

Then I went home and told friend wife about it. She approved eagerly because she felt that it might solve the servant problem.

Since we started housekeeping about eight months ago we've ever had two cooks a week. Tuesdays and Fridays are our days for changing cheese. The old cook leaves Monday evening and the new cook arrives Tuesday morning. Thus the new cook leaves on Thursday evening and the newest cook arrives on Friday, and so on, week without end.

Friend wife decided she could dip a few pancakes in boiling water without the aid of a European kitchen mechanic.

Vegetarians! What a great idea! Now she could get out into the sunlight with school boy complexion, sip forever at the ball door as a perpetual proposition, and wear a broad-brimmed Slavonian outfit demanding 35 per and sit on the washing.

But it was Friday and our latest cook was at that moment annoying the gas range in the kitchen. I made an experiment and find out what merit there is in a vegetable diet.

The eyes have it—send for the Duchess of Dawsabar.

Enter the Duchess, so proud and haughty, with a rolling pin in one hand and a guide to the City of New York in the other. Duchess, I said, this morning she studied the Guide. Even now, and only three weeks from Ellis Island, she knew the city so well that she could go from one situation to another with her eyes closed.

"Ollie," said Duchess, "do you know how to cook vegetables in an appetizing manner?"

"Of course," answered Ollie, her lips curling disdainfully.

Then I chipped in with: "Very well, Ollie. The members of this household are vegetarians for the time being. All of us are vegetarians, including the dog, so please govern yourself accordingly."

Ollie smiled in a broad Irongarian manner and whispered that vegetarians were those who lived in Italy. She confided to us that she could cook vegetables so artistically that the potato would beg them to be like Mimosa with champagne sauce.

Then she blew on her rolling pin as a picture of friend wife's grandfather, and started in to foot the Beef Trust.

Besides, I don't want to live as long as Methowbah. If I did I'd have to learn to Tango some time in the 200 years to come—then I'd be just the same as everybody else in the world.

Can you get a flash of Methowbah at the age of sixty-four taking Tango lessons from Daddy Sloane up at Widenoffer's grill parlors? Ain't he having to survive for 800 years with the dance bug in his dome?

Close the door, Delia. There's a draft.

When Peaches recovered from the shock of my outburst over the potato pudding she said the only way I could secure myself was to take her to the very-latest-in-dulest hotel in New York for dinner.

That is some task if you live up town, where we, because we know new hotels in New York now the same as they open oysters—by the dozen. However, after stuffing my pockets with all my earthly possessions, we hiked forth and started for the Hilltop, feet—the very latest, using in experience brewerie.

Exactly we entered its polished portals we could see from the faces of the clerks and the clocks that a lot of money changed hands before the Hilltop finally became an essential corner.

In the lobby the furniture was covered with school boys, who sat around with a checkbook in each hand and a fountain pen in each letter.

There are more bellhops than bedrooms in the hotel. They use them for change. Every time you give the bellhop a dime he gives you a half-a-a! six bellhops.

We took a peep at the diamond-backed dining room, and when I saw the waiters refusing everything but certified checks in the way of a tip, I said to Peaches, "This is no place for us!" But she wouldn't let go, and we filed in to the aspetite killery.

Very polite Teutonic waiter, with a sergeant-waiter and two corporal-waiters, greeted us and we gave the counterattack. "I handle salads, ye who enter here."

We just grinned, picked up the polite-face napkin and began to admire the cozy furniture.

"Qu souhaite-vous?" said the waiter, bowing so low that I could feel a chill running through my little bank account.

"I guess he means you," I whispered to Peaches, but she looked very seriously at the menu card and I got to bite her lips.

"Je suis tout a votre service," the waiter croooooo

UNIVERSAL PEACE

This nation is now in the midst of a controversy as to how best to promote universal peace. That question we will leave for diplomats to discuss, but peace within nations is no less important than peace between nations and it is heavily laden with prosperity for every citizen within our commonwealth.

Many leading politicians and editors of political platforms have declared war upon business and no cabinet crisis ever resulted. Many men have stood in high places and hurled "gas bombs" at industry; thrust bayonets into business enterprises and bombarded agriculture with indifference. Party leaders have many times broken diplomatic relations with industry; sent political aviators spying through the affairs of business, and political submarines have sent torpedoes crashing into the destiny of commerce. During the past quarter of a century we have fought many a duel with progress, permitted many politicians to carry on a guerilla warfare against civilization and point a pistol at the heart of honest enterprise.

No man should be permitted to cry out for universal peace until his record has been searched for explosives, for no vessel armed or laden with munitions of war should be given a clearance to sail for the port of Universal Peace. Let us by all means have peace, but peace, like charity, should begin at home.

The Wedding Route.

It is reported that the latest thing in wedding invitations is an engraved map showing the way to the church and to the house. Guessing popularity is the mother of innovations. It is not so stated, but unquestionably this helpful scheme originated in Iowa, where wedding guests have been known to lose themselves and wander around for hours through the tangled highways, not reaching the scene of the festival until the rice and old shoes had been thrown and everyone else was on the way home—Providence Journal.

Husband Had His Good Points.

A London museum worker tells how shocked she was to encounter this bit of cynicism in the slums. The conversation was between two women whose marital relations had not been particularly reflective. "Maud," said one of them, "of course we has our troubles with all of 'em. But I'll say this for my second husband—he's better than my first. He's as bad as mine, that prettily all I earn I has for myself."

To Avoid Taking Cold.

How shall we avoid taking cold? To begin with, heed the physiological hint in the advice of a well-known physician. Get up in good time; bathe well; eat three meals of wholesome food a day, and don't hurry about it. Live in the fresh air all the time, day and night, and get in the sunshine whenever you can, and it isn't too hot.

Think Brightness.

Brightness and happiness in the m. I think brightness and happiness in our lives. The future is but the reflection of our present thoughts. We can bring either usable or darkness in the future by thinking bright ns or gloom now. So, let the model of our futures be full of light and joy if we are to insure those qualities for ourselves.

WARSAW EXODUS WITHOUT PANIC

Residents Fled to Moscow In Orderly Manner.

MAJORITY WISHED TO STAY

Russian Government Gave Free Railroad Transportation to All Who Wanted to Leave, but Only 15 Per Cent Took Advantage of the Offer. Retirement Carefully Planned.

Hundreds of refugees from Warsaw are arriving at Moscow daily. Most of them are without money or means of sustenance and are seeking aid at the American consulate, where an extra force of clerks is attempting to supply temporary assistance pending the organization of a Russian relief commission.

The refugees state that, although the population of the Polish capital was convinced that the Germans ultimately would occupy the city, a majority of the citizens elected to remain, only approximately 15 per cent having departed. This accounts for the comparative order and the absence of panic which accompanied the exodus.

When German occupation seemed imminent the government issued an order that third class tickets to any point in the interior of Russia should be given free to all citizens desiring to depart. The only condition attached by the authorities was that residents so leaving would not be allowed to return without a special permit.

Residents Feared Famine.

Those choosing the alternative of departure foresaw that Warsaw would be visited with conditions similar to those imposed on Lodz and that the town would be cut off from the interior of Russia, whence all provisions were obtainable, and that Warsaw would suffer from famine.

The refugees compare the orderly and systematic abandonment of the city with the panic caused by the first German approach last October, when an attempt of the city officials, institutions and private citizens to all bolt at once resulted in indescribable confusion.

The retirement this time was so carefully planned and so systematically executed that it went off like clockwork, and an outsider received the impression that a no more extraordinary phenomenon was occurring than the ordinary summer exodus. Sufficient extra trains had been provided so that travelling conditions on the whole differed little from normal.

Provision Tickets Unnecessary.

An unusual feature of the present abandonment of the city was the fact that provision tickets were made unnecessary.

The bulk of the refugees traveled on foot or with wagons along the highways. Most of the refugees were unable to proceed southward and to Kiev, because the railway to Vilna was requisitioned for military purposes, they took the line to the east, temporarily crowding Moscow, Vladova and Brest-Litovsk. Many of these last three towns in the outlying portions of Warsaw, the destruction of which became a military necessity.

All the territory immediately to the west of Warsaw, combining large factories, Polish estates and peasant dwellings, now present blackened and uninhabitable areas.

Care had been taken that no supplies fortunes should fall into the hands of the Germans and be converted to their use. Other among these destroyed was the $1,000,000 sugar factory belonging to a Polish lawyer, Eugene Kwiatkowski, with about 2,000 tons of sugar.

The factories in the city itself, although abandoned, had not yet been dismantled when the refugees left the city.

SOLDIERS SMITTEN BY BEES.

Thinking They Have Been Struck by Shells, They Fall.

The Third regiment, Kentucky national guard, met a decided defeat in the battle of Bon Harbor, the attacking army being made up of the First and Second regiments. The defeat was brought about by the use of automobiles by members of the Second regiment, who reached the front before the Third regiment had the supplies contained aboard.

During the battle several of the soldiers thought that they had been hit by shells and fell to the ground. Members of the hospital corps examined the wounds and discovered that the men had been stung by bumblebees.

BORROWED A MALLET.

And Went Over to the Enemy's Trenches For It.

One of our men in the trenches, says a London paper, was ordered to bend a few nails in the wire supports of wire entanglements and had become separated from his company. He had hammer, the man coolly walked across the intervening space and politely asked to be lent a hammer or mallet.

To the surprised and pleased at the courage of the man, one of the German soldiers handed him a mallet, and the next morning loose straightened and fixed, the man walked back to the German trench, returned the mallet and calmly rejoined his companions.

Daily Thought.

Kind looks, kind words, kind acts and warm handshakes—these are a secondary means of grace when men are in trouble and bearing their burdens aright.—Dr. John Hall.

Be Patient.

Let not future things disturb thee; for thou will come to them, if it shall be necessary, having with thee the same reason which now thou uses for present things.—Marcus Aurelius.
